Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHARP. Just for a question. I would like to have more time. The time allowed to me is very short, but I will yield.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the science of navigating the air has progressed yet so that with weather way below zero, with very tempestuous winds, we can carry mails by aeroplane in Alaska?

Mr. SHARP. In answer to that question I will say the temperature has nothing whatever to do with the flying of these machines as far as successful operation is concerned. It is a well-known fact that the hydroaeroplane is of great value and that there is less variation of wind and temperature on sea than on land. Yesterday we witnessed one of the greatest gales we have had for months, but I can on authority say to you that a gentleman flew over the Potomac in the face of that gale at the rate of 60 miles an hour.

Mr. MANN. But this transportation is over mountains and over frozen rivers in the wintertime. The only proposition the gentleman has in regard to transportation prevails in Alaska. The gentleman says the temperature has nothing to do with it. Has the temperature nothing to do with the operation of these motors?

Mr. SHARP. The temperature may affect them somewhat, but I wish to inform the gentleman that they have already attained altitudes of 18,000 feet, where the temperature is as cold as in any season of the year in Alaska. They have ascended and surmounted all the mountain peaks in Europe.

Thanking the gentleman for his question, I wish to proceed further by saying it was only last week that the President of the United States, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, appointed a commission—so important did he consider this subject of aero navigation—to inquire into the needs, requirements, and uses of an aerodynamic laboratory, and I hope that the Smithsonian Institution, that splendid institution with which my friend from Illinois, Mr. MANN, is connected as a Regent, I believe, will have it under its exclusive charge and will resume the work that Prof. Langley took up before his death. But these objections as to the expeditious delivery of mail in Alaska only emphasize the reason why we should depart from the well-beaten path of transportation and at this time not calling for extra money, not calling for a dollar to use beyond the appropriation, but to give the Postmaster General the opportunity, in his discretion, not to build aeroplanes, not to construct them, but to let out the contract and allow somebody else at his risk and his expense, when those rivers are frozen up or when the mail trains can not do the work, to deliver this mail expeditiously at the rate of 60 or 70 miles an hour. I will say to the gentleman that it is an accomplished fact. We have exclusive jurisdiction over Alaska. Let us give one of the departments of this Government enough latitude to so use some of the funds, if he thinks best, for the initiation, I was going to say, of this new method of carrying the mail, but I can better say, for the permanent establishment of this very satisfactory and superior method of carrying mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHARP. Now, if I may speak upon this point of order, I would like to be heard. I have not the parliamentary knowledge and skill of the gentleman who has made the point of order, but it seems to me this is not new legislation. This section itself provides for it. If it means anything at all, it means what it says, "That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations," and so forth. It does not seem to me, if that is the point the gentleman raises, that it is in the form of new legislation. It simply pertains to the method of carrying the mails.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The law provides the method of carrying the mail and does not provide this method, and therefore this would be new law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For regulation screen or other wagon service, $2,000,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a question as to the increase of this amount?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has there been a considerable increase in order to take care of the parcel-post service?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Which item is that?

Mr. TILSON. The screen-wagon service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. It is a fact that the service has been largely increased?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes. The gentleman will notice in the last report that there was an unexpended balance on June 30, 1912, of $111,841. The appropriation this year is $2,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, light, fuel, electric power, and incidental expenses pertaining to the maintenance of a subworkshop for the repair of mail equipment at Chicago, Ill., $2,400.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was temporarily out of the Chamber when the item was passed, commencing on line 19, page 16, "For mail bags, cord fasteners, label cases, and material necessary for manufacture and repairing of equipment," and so forth. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether this item ought not to include equipment for the transportation of parcels that go by parcel post, such as mail baskets, mail chests, or boxes?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not think it is particularly necessary to do that, because the parcel-post proposition is not made a separate one. It is covered into and involves the whole question of the transportation of fourth-class mail matter in each branch of the service.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is made under the particular branch, and not under the specific head of the parcel post.

Mr. MANN. I was not suggesting any increase in the appropriation, but inquiring whether in handling the parcel post it will not be necessary to provide baskets or chests in place of mail bags. This provision says:

For mail bags, metal for mail-bag attachments, cord fasteners, label cases, and material necessary for manufacture and repairing of equipment.

And it might be held not to permit them to handle baskets or boxes or chests.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The department has not asked for anything of the kind, and I take it that the general language here will be held by the department to cover all things that are used in connection with transportation. I doubt the wisdom of specifically defining baskets and crates and things of that sort, because there might be other means that we would not include, and that might be held to be an exclusion of them.

Mr. MANN. The enumeration that we have given seems to me to be an exclusion of anything else.

Mr. LLOYD. At the present time, Mr. Chairman, the Post Office Department is making regulations with reference to the parcels that may be presented for carriage, and if a particular thing is presented for carriage it must be presented in a certain way. For example, eggs can not be put in a sack, loosely. They must be packed in some proper kind of shape.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will remember, under the old law everything was mailable as fourth-class matter which could be transported through the mails without injury to the equipment, and some other provision, but under that the department make regulations which would exclude a great many articles on the ground that they could not be transported in mail bags without danger of injury to the equipment. I take it that it goes without saying that in the handling of parcels it will be necessary to have baskets or chests of some kind, apart from what are called mail bags.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Would not that be covered by the general term equipment?

Mr. MANN. This provision is "material necessary for the manufacture and repairing of equipment."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, they might not desire to manufacture mail bags or mail chests. It might not be an economical method of getting them. I do not know. I am sure the gentleman and I will agree that it is necessary to give them authority to provide such equipment as may be desirable for the transportation of this mail matter. I call it to the gentleman's attention and to the attention of the House because I am satisfied that under this provision of the law it is doubtful if they now have authority to provide the equipment that will be most convenient and safe in the handling of parcels.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am uncertain, in view of what the gentleman has said, whether this language is broad enough to cover every class of equipment; but it seems from the construction that has been given by the department that they are making arrangements to carry everything that is covered by fourth-class mail.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how they construe it, whether they can provide anything except something in the form of a mail bag.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $49,000,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois suspend for just a moment? The present occupant of the chair is not the designated chairman for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, the chairman, told me a moment ago, when he asked me to occupy the chair temporarily, that he was satisfied that a point of order would be made against this paragraph, and that he had looked the matter up and prepared an opinion on it, as I understood him to say. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to let this point of order go over temporarily until the gentleman from Tennessee returns. Without objection, the point of order will be passed over temporarily.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, at $3,000 each; 4 assistant superintendents, at $2,200 each; 15 assistant division superintendents, at $2,000 each; 112 chief clerks, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 32 clerks, grade 10, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 304 clerks, grade 9, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 1,527 clerks, grade 8, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 1,168 clerks, grade 7, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 4,201 clerks, grade 6, at not exceeding $1,400 each, 5,252 clerks, grade 5, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 3,656 clerks, grade 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 405 clerks, grade 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 1,695 clerks, grade 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 1,750 clerks, grade 1, at not exceeding $900 each; in all, $24,360,000; and, to enable the Postmaster General to reclassify the salaries of railway postal clerks, he may exceed the number of clerks in such of the grades as may be necessary: Provided, That the number of clerks in the aggregate as herein authorized be not exceeded.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, right there I want to offer an amendment:

That the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater expenditure than this sum.

This is subject to a point of order, unquestionably. It has been made heretofore. But the differences in the calculations between the Treasury Department under this bill and the actual figures are very great. In other words, the Treasury gives a credit for very large sums of money to the Post Office Department that the department does not ask for, and ought not to have, in view of the fact that these clerks, many of them, do not go in on the first day of the fiscal year, but are distributed through different parts of the year, while the Treasury Department calculates the whole sum from the initial day. It makes quite a difference in the amounts available for the department.

It is not intended to make available any more than that which is provided in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment. Will he again state his amendment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. In line 8, page 19, add the words:

And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send up his amendment so that the Clerk can report it?

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 8, after the word "exceeded," insert the following: "And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I concede that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order. As I understand, the law that we passed last year provided that clerks in charge should receive a higher rate of compensation, or at least be promoted to a higher grade than the other clerks, after three years' continuous and satisfactory service. I notice in the bill that there are 32 clerks of grade 10, not exceeding $1,800 each, which is the same number as are carried in the current law.

Mr. LLOYD. In that connection the question has been raised since the estimates were submitted, and since the hearing before the committee, as to whether this provides in a proper way for the promotion of these clerks. The department, as we have learned in the last few days, holds that an individual is not eligible to be promoted until he has served at least three years.

Mr. MURDOCK. At least three years in a given place.

Mr. LLOYD. At least three years in a given place, and the result of that has made considerable confusion, and the railway clerks are not satisfied with the provision as it now presents itself. After consultation with the chairman and other members of the committee, it is understood that this matter shall be investigated and a statement obtained from the Post Office Department as to what will be the effect of the suggested change, and what is the effect of this provision as it now stands; and we expect the matter to be threshed out in the Senate, and an accurate statement given by that time, so that we will have information as to what should be done.

Mr. MANN. The law now provides that these clerks shall receive promotions under certain conditions. That is a matter of construction of the law which may be decided by the Court of Claims if it becomes necessary. If a proper construction of the law is not given, and if a man does not receive proper promotion, he may be able to go into the Court of Claims and have the Court of Claims construe the law; but if the amendment now offered is agreed to and becomes a part of the law, such a man will have no right in the Court of Claims at all, because, however much right of promotion he may have under existing law, that right is cut off by the amendment offered by the gentleman in charge of the bill. I had understood that these railway-mail clerks were entitled to certain classification and promotion under the law that we adopted last year. There is a controversy as to whether they have received that promotion. It does not seem to me that we ought to construe the law contrary to what we thought it was when we adopted it last year.

Mr. LLOYD. We are not aiming to construe it that way at all, and the committee quite fully agree with the gentleman's view of the matter, I think. The gentleman has not gone far enough to explain his view fully, but I am quite sure it is the purpose of the committee to get the information that is necessary with reference to this matter. The estimate was submitted by the department in accordance with the classification. The appropriation is made in accordance with that estimate, and it was supposed by the department, I imagine, and certainly it was supposed by the committee, that we were carrying out the classification law and making the necessary appropriation for it; but since the bill came to the House certain representatives of the Railway Mail Service have said that the construction that is placed upon the law by the department is not the construction which they believe the committee and the Congress intended.

Mr. MANN. I believe the question is, where the law now provides that the appropriation shall be made after three years of continuous and satisfactory service, whether that means service after this law took effect, on the 1st of October last, or whether it means three years' service including the service prior to that. I think when the bill was passed everyone here understood that it meant what it said—three years' continuous and satisfactory service.

Mr. LLOYD. That is the way we understand it.

Mr. MANN. I think it was not intended to say that the law should not be in effect until three years after it took effect. With the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] everything is foreclosed, because the department can not exceed the total of the appropriation, regardless of whether a man in the service is entitled to promotion under the existing law or not.

Mr. LLOYD. But if in the Senate this matter is changed, they will change the totals.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that if in the Senate this matter is changed it will then be time enough to insert this limitation?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Illinois insists on his point of order, of course, it is well taken. I think the amount, however, covers the changes.

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order. I think it is a matter of considerable interest.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I should like to ask my colleague, or the chairman of the committee, a question.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In regard to the increase of the railway postal clerks that is provided in the bill of last year, it seems to be operating very unsatisfactorily, as I have had many complaints from my district, and I have heard of complaints coming in from other places. I should like to know, if the information can be given me, whether it is due to the fact that they have not had sufficient money?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I said I had had many complaints from railway postal clerks in my district, and I have heard of many in other places, that they have not been promoted as they consider they are entitled to be. The law is not operating satisfactorily, as they consider the law should be applied which was passed last year. The information I want is whether that is due to any arbitrary position taken by the department, or whether it is because they have not had a sufficient amount of money to put it into effect?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not understand that there is any lack of money. The inquiry was made by me of the department, and the information was that it was due to the efficiency record of the clerks; they did not promote those that were not entitled to be promoted. They determine the degree of efficiency that will entitle them to promotion, and in instances where it has not been given they have uniformly advised me that it was on account of the want of efficiency. I have had half a dozen cases of that kind.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The chairman of the committee has had complaints in regard to it, I understand?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask whether the committee has considered it and whether it is necessary to make any further provision?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know how Congress can make provision that promotion shall be given to clerks that are not efficient, and I know of no way that Congress can determine the efficiency of the clerk. It is a matter of discretion and judgment that must be left to the department.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is there no way of avoiding discrimination by the department?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There is no way of avoiding discrimination by the party into whose hands the law puts the judgment and discretion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have had complaints from clerks that they have been discriminated against, and that if they got to a place where they could pass the examination and be promoted they have been changed to another part of the country, which made it impossible for them to qualify under this provision in the Post Office bill. To me this is not a light matter. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction among the clerks, and I am asking for information in regard to the matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have given the gentleman all the information I have. If the gentleman has any amendment that will properly remove the situation, it will be accepted by the committee. I knew of no way that we can control it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me one more suggestion——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. While the bill fixes the number of clerks in the different classes, it contains the catchall provision that the Postmaster General may exceed the number of clerks in such of the grades as may be necessary in order to make a reclassification, provided that the number of clerks in the aggregate as herein authorized be not exceeded.

That would authorize the Postmaster General, in order to carry out the classification, to increase the number of clerks in the grade of $1,800 and take those off from the $900 grade. But with the amendment now pending, restricting the total appropriation to the amount named in the bill, of course that could not be effective without reducing the number of clerks.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. I notice this appropriation is between $300,000 and $400,000 less than the estimates. Does the chairman think it would be sufficient to provide for the promotion referred to by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The department thought so.

Mr. GILLETT. But the department estimate was $400,000 more than the committee gives.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will turn to pages 58, 59, and 60 of the hearings, he will find the views of the Second Assistant Postmaster General on this question. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to prolong the discussion on this question. I think that the department can take care of itself. If the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order, I will concede it.

Mr. MANN. As the matter stands now, Mr. Chairman, I shall feel compelled to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, line 14, amend by striking out the words "thirty-two" and inserting the words "three hundred and twelve." Lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "three hundred and four" and insert the words "one thousand three hundred and sixty-six." In lines 16 and 17 strike out the words "one thousand five hundred and twenty-seven" and insert the words "three hundred and two." Lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "one thousand one hundred and sixty-eight" and insert the words "two thousand nine hundred and thirty-four." Line 20, strike out the words "four thousand two hundred and one" and insert the words "two thousand three hundred and eighteen."

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, the passage of this amendment——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the point of order?

Mr. LLOYD. I have reserved it.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this is subject to a point of order. This does not increase in any way the number of employees, but it provides for carrying out the intention of the existing law, which was passed by this House last year, providing that after a service of three years clerks in charge should be given a certain promotion. This bill does not provide for that promotion, but this amendment is to make the promotions legal and in order.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I am in full accord with the purpose of the amendment, but I have no information at the present time whether this accompliishes that purpose or not. I have had presented to me a statement similar to the one the gentleman from Connecticut had, handed me by one of the representatives of the railway mail clerks, but I do not know whether it is accurate. It is not my purpose to vote blindly on these questions. I do not believe at this time we could wisely, without any information from the Post Office Department, without knowledge ourselves, correct that which we do not know is correct or not. So I believe the best thing to do is to let the matter rest as it is, as it was presented by the Post Office Department and passed upon by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri make the point of order?

Mr. LLOYD. No, Mr. Chairman; I will not make the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I was going to address myself to the point of order, if one was made by the gentleman from Missouri, but he has withdrawn it. But I want to say about this item that the clerks in charge of the Railway Mail Service are men who have charge of a car, with others under them, and of course these men draw under the present law from $1,400 to $1,800 a year. In our reclassification act, which we passed last year, it was provided that after a man had served three years in the capacity of a clerk in charge he would be entitled to another promotion. The department has held—and if the law passes as it is reported in the bill—a man will not get promotion from one of these grades to the grade succeeding until he shall have served another three years. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut is adopted, then these promotions will come, where there is efficiency once a year to the men who are now in charge, provided they have been clerks in charge three years, and that is the real purpose of the amendment and what it would accomplish.

Mr. MANN. I did not quite catch the gentleman's statement. Class A is $1,300 to $1,400, is it not?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The clerk in charge is supposed to receive $1,400?

Mr. MURDOCK. One thousand four hundred dollars.

Mr. MANN. That is, after three years' service?

Mr. MURDOCK. After three years' service he gets this promotion.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that under the proposition that is now made he would be entitled to that promotion in one year. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. MURDOCK. I mean that after he has become a clerk in charge the department is holding that he shall serve three years additional in that capacity at $1,300 before receiving a promotion to $1,400. If the gentleman's amendment passes, he can get that promotion within a year.

Mr. MANN. After he has served three years satisfactorily?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, yes; after he has had three years of service in the service as a clerk in charge.

Mr. MANN. Is he not entitled to the promotion at once under the existing law if he has served three years continuously satisfactorily, if he is placed in charge?

Mr. MURDOCK. My understanding is that he is, and he should be promoted after he has served three years, but I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does not catch me on this, that after he has served in the $1,300 class for one year the department, under its interpretation of the law, does not give him a promotion if he is entitled to it, but holds that he must serve three years in each succeeding grade.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Surely.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is what happens, as I understand it. At present a great many in the Railway Mail Service have served anywhere from 3 to 25 years, but under the bill reported by the committee none of these men would be eligible to promotion immediately, if the bill were interpreted strictly; and the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] is intended to clear up that doubt, and to permit the promotion of men to the next highest grade who have served creditably for more than three years after the enactment of this bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. And it will do that thing.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what it will do. Otherwise, it is altogether likely that the department will rule that an additional three years of service will be required before anyone of these men is entitled to promotion.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], a member of the committee, that this is a matter that should go to the Senate before it is put into the bill, I would state that the estimate of the increase in this reclassification has been quite carefully made.

Mr. LLOYD. By whom has it been made?

Mr. REILLY. By those in a position to do it, who are thoroughly familiar with it.

Mr. LLOYD. Has it been made by the department?

Mr. REILLY. It has not, so far as I know.

Mr. LLOYD. Has it been made by the Post Office Committee of the House?

Mr. REILLY. It has not, except by members——

Mr. LLOYD. Has any suggestion of this amendment been made to the Committee on the Post Office of the House?

Mr. REILLY. Not as a committee, so far as I know.

Mr. LLOYD. The information the gentleman has gathered is information that he obtained from the railway postal clerks, and I do not doubt that it may be correct; but the point with me is I do not know. The committee has not investigated it. The department has not passed upon it, and we are asked, at the instance of one or two men on the outside, to change this appropriation bill. We should be cautious about such a procedure.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to simply carry out what Congress intended to carry out when it enacted section 7 of the bill last year.

Mr. REILLY. Simply that.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I said a moment ago that I was in full sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY], but I do not know whether he accomplishes that purpose or not by the amendment. I want to carry out the law, as far as I am concerned, in good faith, and I want this appropriation bill to do it, and if it does not I will cheerfully support any amendment which does meet the provisions of the law when I am convinced that such amendment will accomplish that result.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Connecticut if his amendment increases a number of clerks or simply rearranges a different classification?

Mr. REILLY. It does not increase the number of clerks at all, but it rearranges the classification.

Mr. LOBECK. And it does not increase the amount?

Mr. LLOYD. It does.

Mr. COX. If it was the intention of Congress last year to provide an automatic increase in the postal clerks, then your amendment does not add one dollar to the appropriation.

Mr. REILLY. None whatever.

Mr. COX. It simply carries out the intention that Congress had when it enacted section 7.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but it does add to the appropriation now pending.

Mr. COX. That may be true; but it does not, if Congress had in view last year to provide for an automatic increase in this force. I think it does it, but that is what Congress wanted to do.

Mr. KENDALL. That was the intention?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. As I understand it, this does not increase the number of clerks in the department.

Mr. REILLY. Not at all.

Mr. FOWLER. But I understand it may increase the appropriation.

Mr. REILLY. But not more than the correct interpretation of the law, as we passed it last year, would increase it.

Mr. FOWLER. It may increase the appropriation as the bill now stands.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. But it does not conflict with the law that was passed at the last session of Congress?

Mr. REILLY. In no way whatever.

Mr. FOWLER. And it is intended to carry out the provisions of that law in spirit and in fact?

Mr. REILLY. In spirit and in fact.

Mr. FOWLER. And if this amendment passes, it will do that?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And will be perfectly satisfactory to the railway postal clerks.

Mr. REILLY. And everybody else who believes in fair treatment and the carrying out of the law as intended.

Mr. FOWLER. And will be not only a substantial but a complete compliance with the law?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Connecticut be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows why, under the circumstances, the committee did not take up this question and try to make the provision under this law apply as was intended by Congress one year ago. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] says the committee has not considered the matter. There has been complaint about this law not being in effect, and that is why I would like to know why the committee did not consider it.

Mr. REILLY. It did not come before the committee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And I would like to ask if the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut is adopted by this House it will make possible the promotion of those clerks in accordance with the law passed by Congress?

Mr. REILLY. Those clerks who will have served three years.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then if the bill passes without the gentleman's amendment it will make a delay of the promotions Congress has provided for?

Mr. REILLY. If this amendment is not passed, there will be no promotion among clerks in charge who previous to last October have served more than three years as such.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY]. The Chair will state that the entire amendment includes several propositions. Without objection, they will be put as a whole.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "24,360,000" of the figures and inserting instead the figures "25,941,100."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 19, line 4, by striking out the figures "24,360,000" and insert in lieu thereof "25,941,100."

Mr. LLOYD. If I understand this amendment, it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. LLOYD. I make the point of order, but withhold it if the gentleman wishes to be heard.

Mr. GILLETT. All right. I do not see how it is in the slightest degree subject to a point of order, for it only changes a total. I made this amendment merely to point out what I think is an error, not only in this paragraph but in other paragraphs of the bill, because the payments to the clerks which precede this gross sum, multiplied by the number of clerks, will amount not to the figure which is in the bill but the figure which I have named.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the trouble is that the gentleman's statement is based on two things.

Mr. GILLETT. I will be glad to have it explained.

Mr. LLOYD. You base your statement upon what you suppose to be the fact, that all these clerks will be employed during the whole of the year.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no.

Mr. LLOYD. There is added to the force in this provision quite a number of clerks. Some of these will be added in three months and some of them in six months and others in nine months, and they will not serve during the whole of the year. Now, the effect of the bill is to provide for promotion from time to time, but it does not provide for all promotions at the beginning of the year, and hence if we make an appropriation which provides for the full number of clerks with full pay we provide far more money than the department asks or it is intended to carry in this bill, and the reason these are carried in this bill is to permit the department to make promotions from one class to another and also during the year to add to the force, and it is not intended to secure a full force at the beginning and keep it to the end, nor is it intended that all promotions shall be made on the 1st day of July.

Mr. GILLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate fully the facts that the gentleman has stated. I appreciate it is true here, as it is true in other departments of the Government, that in appropriating for a certain number of clerks we appropriate more than is expended, because clerks may die and there may be vacancies, as there always are. But it does not seem to me that that excuses the committee from making a statement which does not correspond to the facts.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] offered his amendment, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the point of order. If that amendment had prevailed, I recognize that then it would have been perfectly proper to have left this total amount as it is, because that would have limited the expense to the amount which you think is all that would be spent. And I think the gentleman is correct about it, and if that amendment had been adopted, then I think it would have been proper that the figures should remain as they are. But inasmuch as that amendment was not adopted, it seems to me that the committee is falling into this error, that we are appropriating for a certain number of clerks a certain amount, and then at the end we are pretending that we do not appropriate that amount, although we do, and that is the way the bill was reported from the committee. And although I recognize that the full amount of what we appropriate is never spent in any of the departments or bureaus, yet to pretend that we are not appropriating so much is cutting down the apparent appropriation a million and a half below what we really are appropriating, because we are really apropriating in this twenty-five and a half millions and not really appropriating the twenty-four millions, and it seems to me it is a deception to say that we are appropriating only twenty-four millions, and makes an unreal and delusive appearance of economy.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for just a moment? He will notice there is an unexpended balance on this appropriation of more than half a million in the last year?

Mr. GILLETT. I appreciate that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We have cut the appropriation less than five hundred. The gentleman will notice, further, that there is an increase of salaries in the recommendation here which the committee has not allowed. There is ample money to take care of these men.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly; but when the department made this estimate they had in it the clause which the gentleman offered as an amendment, and that has gone out on a point of order. If that clause were in, this amount would be proper; but as it is, although it makes no practical difference in the amount of money the department will expend, yet the difference it makes is that the gentleman here is saying in his bill that he only appropriates $24,360,000, when he really appropriates $25,500,000, so that the appropriation bill is a million and a half in appearance less than it really is; and I do not think that is proper finance.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. MANN. Upon what basis does the gentleman arrive at the figures he offers—the bill as reported to the House or the bill as perfected by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY]?

Mr. GILLETT. I recognize that they can not be absolutely correct, because——

Mr. MANN. We have just added very materially to the total appropriation by items, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] says that it is not exactly a fraud, but intimates that we are not appropriating, in fact, what we apparently are appropriating, and he offers an amendment which is subject to precisely the same criticism that he makes against the original bill.

Mr. GILLETT. I admit that. But my amendment was prepared before the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] was offered.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We do not wholly adopt, I may say to the gentleman, the recommendation of the department, because we declined to raise some positions and raise some salaries; for instance, three division superintendents at $3,500 each. We put them at only $3,000 each.

Mr. GILLETT. My amendment was prepared before the introduction of this amendment. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that my amendment was prepared in accordance with the estimates of the department. Mine was prepared before the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] was adopted. It is true that not only in this paragraph but that in other paragraphs we appropriate——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is the same position that the gentleman from Massachusetts took on Saturday, when it was controverted.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman said then that when the paragraph was reached the correction would be made. Now it has been reached.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, in order to save time, that I think that amendment will go in yet.

Mr. GILLETT. It has not gone in in the House. I want to call attention to the fact that this bill really appropriates several million dollars more than the figures show. That is all.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Tennessee will permit, with reference to the statement that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] made on Saturday, and which was concurred in by the gentleman's colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. FITZGERALD, of New York, I want to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts failed, in making his comparison between the estimate and the action of the committee, to take into account the fact that the department in making its estimates does not carry them out as the gentleman proposes to carry them out now; and when the gentleman said in his statement on Saturday that the committee had exceeded the estimates, the gentleman was mistaken, because the department had pursued exactly the same course with reference to these appropriations as the committee, or rather the committee had pursued exactly the same course as the department.

The estimates are made according to the amount of money that is supposed to be needed. The department has done that, and so has the committee, and when the gentleman from Massachusetts says that the bill carries more than was recommended by the department, I feel quite sure the gentleman is at fault in his statement.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman from Missouri there, but that is not what I am discussing now, and I do not care to revert to it. What I say now—and apparently it is not controverted by the gentlemen on that side, and can not be—is that the amounts given in the summary are much less than the details really aggregate, and although I agree that probably no larger sum will be expended than is mentioned in the summary, yet I say it is misleading, because the appropriation bill really appropriates several million dollars more than the committee says it will amount to, and I do not think that is good legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. This appropriation bill is based on the experience of the department, is it not——

Mr. GILLETT. Yes——

Mr. MADDEN. That a given percentage of the men in this service will be promoted, and that at a certain period of the year men will be getting $800, and that at a certain period of the year they will be getting $900?

Mr. GILLETT. I appreciate that.

Mr. MADDEN. And none of the grades contain the total number of men for the year?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And, as a matter of fact, the appropriation covers the exact experience of the department, regardless of what the figures in the bill might lead one to conclude. Is not that true?

Mr. GILLETT. Well, that is what will be expended, but we are now appropriating what can be expended, not what will be. What the total of the bill holds is not the amount that will probably be expended, but the amount that the department has at its disposal to expend.

Mr. MADDEN. I grant that if you appointed every man on the 1st of January and kept him continuously employed until the 31st of next December, more will be expended than is appropriated.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; and under this bill the department has the right to do that.

Mr. MADDEN. Without the limitation?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; without the limitation, and the limitation has been struck out; and the figures in the bill purport to be not what amount will be expended, but the amount that will be in the power of the department to expend; and I say, in view of that, that the figures are misleading.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY], whose amendment was adopted, considerably increasing the authorization of expenditures, whether he intends to propose an amendment increasing the total carried on line 4, page 19?

Mr. REILLY. I would be perfectly willing to see that amendment offered, increasing it $300,000.

Mr. MADDEN. $231,000. That is what it figures.

Mr. MANN. It will be more than $231,000. I apprehend that it will.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the way it figures in my mind.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman figured that probably by just adding $100 to the different grades, whereas in some grades $300 are added.

Mr. COX. I think it is about $300,000.

Mr. GILLETT. The department here has estimated nearly $420,000 more than this $24,360,000.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the criticism offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is in one sense correct and in another sense it is hardly justified. It is true that under the existing law, when the appropriation is made in the form in which it is made here, the Treasury Department takes the items instead of the total, and the items amount to more than the total.

On the other hand, the total is taken as a sort of guide at least by the Post Office Department, and I think it never has been exceeded. If it were exceeded, there would probably be criticism of it. But in view of the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that the limitation amendment which he offered a while ago, which was not agreed to because of a point of order which I made, would probably go in to the bill here or elsewhere, I do not know that I should make the point of order if this correction were made. Does not the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] think that the total here should be corrected at least to correspond with the correction of the item? If that be done, I shall have no objection to the limitation.

Mr. REILLY. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think we have money enough, in view of the fact that these clerks do not all go in at the beginning of the fiscal year and there is an unexpended balance.

Mr. KENDALL. Let it be passed over until it can be properly prepared.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I should rather take a vote on the gentleman's proposition. I think this bill has all the money that is needed. The gentleman has been complaining bitterly because it carried too much and now he wants to add to it.

Mr. MANN. I should like to have an amendment adopted which would actually carry the law into effect.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to withdraw the amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Why not let the paragraph be passed over until the gentleman can see what the amount is that is to be added by this item? Then his limitation can be put in.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimouse consent that the paragraph be passed over without prejudice, to be recurred to later.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. For the purpose of making a correction, if found necessary.

Mr. MANN. And you may want to offer your amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And for the purpose of offering an amendment to limit the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the paragraph be passed without prejudice, to be recurred to at the desire of the chairman of the committee. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RODENBERG. Before proceeding further with the bill, I ask that we return to page 17, lines 21–24, which were passed during the temporary absence of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] asks unanimous consent to return to the last paragraph on page 17, which was passed during the temporary absence of the permanent Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman to wait until we finish the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. RODENBERG. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his request?

Mr. RODENBERG. No; I will not insist on it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There are two or three pages to be read under the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel allowances to railway postal clerks, acting railway postal clerks, and substitute railway postal clerks, including substitute railway postal clerks for railway postal clerks granted leave with pay on account of sickness, $1,465,030.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following joint resolution:

S. J. Res. 149. Extending the time for the survey, classification, and appraisement of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in Oklahoma.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 27148.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

After line 13, page 19, add the following:

"Hereafter railway postal clerks shall be allowed an annual leave of absence of 30 days with full pay."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I believe that is subject to a point of order, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the gentleman if he will reserve it for a moment or two?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the attention particularly of the chairman of the committee. I understand that these clerks under the law now have an annual leave, with pay, of 15 days only, and that practically all other employees of the Government have an annual leave of 30 days with pay. Is that true?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand that is about the fact.

Mr. NORRIS. While I admit that this is legislation and is subject to the point of order that the chairman of the committee seems disposed to make, I have never been able to understand why this class of employees should not be allowed the 30 days' annual leave that practically all the other employees of the Government have. If there is a class of employees in the Government who are entitled to liberal treatment it seems to me it is the railway post-office clerks who are doing a work that is not only dangerous, but is difficult in every respect, and whose salaries are as low, in my judgment, for the amount of work they do and the labor they have to perform as any other class of employees. I understand that an ordinary clerk here in any of the offices in Washington gets 30 days' leave of absence with pay, and why these men who perform a service that is second to none in the entire Government service should not be given the same privileges is something that I never could understand. It seems to me it is hardly fair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. They only run about half the time.

Mr. KENDALL. But the other half of the time they are engaged in preparing themselves for their work.

Mr. NORRIS. While it is true that some of these employees are working only a portion of the time and are off the balance of the time, the time that they are off is necessary for their preparation to perform their duty properly when they are on. The routes are constantly changing, and it requires constant and almost daily study on the part of these men to keep up the efficiency that they have attained. There are some postal clerks who run every day. I think they, however, are perhaps a small proportion of the service, so far as number is concerned; but those who have difficult runs and make long distances can not, from the physical standpoint alone, perform that work every day, because it is too difficult.

In the next place, it is necessary, if I understand it, that they should retain the proficiency, and they must engage in study when they are not actually on trains doing the work.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILL. Are these the only classes of post-office employees that are given 15 days leave of absence?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know. As far as my information goes this particular class is the only class in the Government service, and yet I presume there are others.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. MANN. How much vacation do the clerks and carriers in the post offices get?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I think they get 15 days.

Mr. MANN. I think they all get the same, and if the gentleman's proposition to increase the vacation period of one is passed, we might as well increase them all.

Mr. NORRIS. We have already fixed the vacation of a majority of clerks in the employ of the Government at 30 days.

Mr. MANN. I think not outside of Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Why should Washington be an exception?

Mr. MANN. I do not know that it should, although having been here a few summers I think there are some reasons that would apply to the clerks in Washington and not to clerks in other parts of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Some of these railway postal clerks are doing work in a climate as bad as the city of Washington and some of it worse. Their work is of such a nature that it ought to appeal to every man to give them more of a vacation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reference to this item that we have done a good deal for the railway postal clerks in the committee, in the House, and the Senate, and are trying to do more.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, here is a good opportunity.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But we must not be asked to do everything at once. These men are off one-half of their time, and while they do have to study their schedules when they are off the gentleman knows, as I do, that they do not apply themselves all the time to that duty while they are off. It is practically a vacation a part of each week.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not true that they have to take an examination every six months?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; but it does not take all of their time.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not necessary that they should study the schedules?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; but the gentleman knows that when a man is off with his wife and children and at home half of the time that it is practically a vacation, that he is not sitting down and studying his schedules all the time. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For actual and necessary expenses, general superintendents and assistant general superintendents, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $80,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 4, by striking out the "s" in the word "superintendents," and also in the second word "superintendents," in the same line, strike out the letter "s."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4 strike out the letter "s" in the word "superintendents" where it first occurs, and also the "s" in the word "superintendents" where it next occurs, so that it will read "general superintendent" and "assistant general superintendent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, light, fuel, telegraph, and miscellaneous office expenses, schedules of mail trains, telephone service, and badges for railway postal clerks, $80,000, including rental of offices for division headquarters, Railway Mail Service, in Washington, D. C.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, line 10, by striking out the word "and" after the word "telegraph" and inserting the word "and" after the word "miscellaneous."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, line 10, strike out the word "and" before "miscellaneous" and insert the word "and" after the word "miscellaneous."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 13, after the word "headquarters," by inserting the words "and chief clerks."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 13, insert after the word "headquarters" the words "and chief clerks."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $800,000: Provided, That the rate of compensation to be paid per mile shall not exceed the rate now paid to companies performing such service, except that the Postmaster General, in cases where the quantity of mail is large and the number of exchange points numerous, may, in his discretion, authorize payment for closed-pouch service at a rate per mile not to exceed one-third above the rate per mile now paid for closed-pouch service; and for mail cars and apartments carrying the mails, not to exceed the rate of 1 cent per linear foot per car-mile of travel: Provided further, That the rates for electric-car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads: Provided, however, That not to exceed $15,000 of the sum hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise, and not to exceed $100,000 of this appropriation may be expended for regulation, screen, or motor screen wagon service which may be authorized in lieu of electric or cable car service.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as an addition to that paragraph. Add after line 18 the words "Provided, That when such railway shall violate any part of such service according to its contract, then all pay for such carriage of mails shall cease."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 18, page 20, the words "Provided, That when such railway shall violate any part of such service according to its contract, then all pay for such carriage of mails shall cease."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order at all. It is in keeping with the limitation. Here is a provision for the purpose of giving employment to inland mail service carried by railways. This can only be done by contract with the United States, and that contract must be specific on its face. Its terms must be specific. The number of mails carried by the road during the day must be specified, the amount to be paid must be specified.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that be true, then this amendment is simply in keeping with the provisions of this paragraph which seeks to carry out the contract which the Government makes with the railway. If the Government makes a contract with the railroad to carry for a specified sum a certain number of trips through a certain territory, then if that railway should fail to comply with the contract this amendment, of course, would stop the pay of the railroad as long as the violation continued. That is the object of the amendment. In my opinion, it could not be new legislation in any sense whatever. It is intended to carry out in good faith the objects of this paragraph.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard from the distinguished chairman of this committee no reason for his point of order, and I can see no reason for it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman let me state my point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is that this is new law and not a limitation on the appropriation, for which the gentleman might have a right to offer an amendment in proper language. This is an entirely new proposition respecting the contractual relations between the Government and the carrier.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; but, Mr. Chairman, it does in its terms seek to lessen the appropriation and comes directly under the Holman rule.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Beginning on line 7, page 21, we find this provision:

Provided further, That the rates for electric-car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads.

Now, if the gentleman's amendment is new legislation it applies to this provision in the paragraph, which is also new legislation, and the point of order made against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] would be carried back to that part of the paragraph, and if good as against his amendment must be good as against that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman make the point of order against that amendment?

Mr. CULLOP. No, I am not making the point of order; but what I do insist upon as a matter of parliamentary practice is that if the point of order be made against this amendment and be insisted upon, that that point of order necessarily will be carried back and will strike out that provision. It is just like a demurrer to a complaint or answer in a case in court. It searches the whole paragraph to which it is directed, and must be so considered in ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit the Chair to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] concede that that is all new law, beginning with line 8 and extending to the end of the paragraph?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not recollect whether it is or not. It has been carried in the appropriation bills, but I do not know whether the general statute provides for it or not.

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the statute by which this contract is made with the railroad companies provide only for the carrying of mail on steam railroads, and was it not passed before the practice of carrying mail on electric railways had arisen?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is the old statute. There is no question about that.

Mr. CULLOP. And it never has been amended upon that subject. I not only indorse this new legislation that is offered here, because I think it is appropriate, but I do insist that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is germane to that part of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. To which part of the paragraph?

Mr. CULLOP. To the part of the paragraph beginning with the word "Provided," in line 7, which I read to the Chair a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the amendment is not proposed at that point, but is proposed at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. CULLOP. It was proposed at the end of the paragraph because the gentleman from Illinois could not be recognized at that part of the paragraph where it specifically applies, because, under the rule, the whole paragraph must be read through before he could be recognized; but it is germane to that part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, the Chair will suggest that, of course, at the conclusion of the paragraph the gentleman from Illinois, being recognized, could have proposed his amendment to any portion of the paragraph to which he desired to propose it. The Chair desires to get rid of the point of order as soon as possible. The Chair understands that when new legislation is proposed in an appropriation bill, and the point of order is not made, that then any amendment germane to that legislation is itself in order, even though it may be new legislation. The Chair understands that to be a well-settled proposition of parliamentary law.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman's amendment again reported. I think it is an independent section.

Mr. FOWLER. No; it is not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair rules——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled. He simply suggested a principle of parliamentary law.

Mr. MANN. It is upon that item that I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has the floor, if he desires to say anything further.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this paragraph containing new legislation, a point of order to the whole paragraph would be sustained by the Chair, inasmuch as the paragraph carries that new legislation, conceded to be such by the chairman of the committee; but an amendment to the paragraph would be in order under the rule that when there is new legislation proposed in a paragraph an amendment which is germane to that is in order. Had a point of order been made against this paragraph, the Chair would have been compelled to sustain the point of order, and the paragraph would have gone out.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to spend all of the day here discussing the point of order. I will submit the question to the judgment of the House and withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. Mr. Chairman, while the rule is, as stated by the Chair a moment ago, in part, at least, that where an item in a bill subject to a point of order gets beyond the point of making it, it is subject to amendment; still such an amendment, in order to be considered germane under the rules of the House, is restricted to a narrower field than would ordinarily be so in reference to an amendment. The rule is well settled that when an amendment offered to a provision which was itself subject to the point of order can not introduce a new subject matter, the amendment may in a sense be germane, and it may be that the amendment would have been in order under the ordinary rules of the House, and yet the rulings in recent years have been consistent that if any amendment proposed introduced a new subject matter it was subject to the point of order, although offered to a provision which had gotten beyond the point of making the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Is not the provision in this paragraph made for the purpose of paying for the transportation of inland mail over railroads, and is not that the subject, and the whole subject, of this paragraph?

Mr. MANN. As I understood the amendment of the gentleman, it purported to enforce a penalty in reference to contracts. There is no provision in this paragraph relative to contracts or relative to penalty for contracts, or for the failure to carry out contracts. And if under an amendment, on the ground that the original paragraph was subject to a point of order, you can offer now any amendment relating to any contract which the Government may make for carrying the mail, you can offer anything and hold that it is germane. It seems to me—and I do not even understand what the gentleman desires to accomplish—but it seems to me that it introduces an entirely new subject matter, which is not referred to at all in the proposition carried in the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I will say that this amendment deals directly with the pay of railroads for carrying inland mail.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] for information: Suppose your amendment passed, would it add anything to the law as it now exists? The Government has the right to do what you want to do now.

Mr. FOWLER. It would be a limitation on the amount of money paid to the railroads who had violated their contracts.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course it would be a limitation under the law and under the contract. But you are attempting to add a thing they have a right to do now in the department. If carriers violate the law, they stop the pay.

Mr. FOWLER. Suppose that is not done; and I know it is not done——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The law requires it now to be done. What are you going to do about making it good hereafter by another law? Do you want to continue to pass laws every time they fail to execute the law?

Mr. FOWLER. Because of the fact if there is a law specifically requiring the pay to stop, I do not know of it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course it is not specific. It is true of a contract made under the law for carrying the mail, if you take all the laws on the subject. If this law is violated the Government has a right to stop the pay.

Mr. FOWLER. If the rural-route carrier fails to carry the mail one day you stop his pay, but when a great corporation agrees to carry the mail twice a day and only makes one trip instead of two, you seek to prevent a reduction.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You do not do yourself or your interests any good, for the simple reason that you have somebody in the department that is there to administer the law. You could not strengthen the law by your amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. If your position is correct, then the point of order can not be maintained at all.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not think it can, but I withdrew my point of order in order to quit this debate, and ask the Chair to rule on the point of order; but the gentleman from Illinois renewed the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask that the amendment be again read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 21, by inserting at the end of line 18 the following:
"Provided, That whenever any railway shall violate its contract for such service, then all pay for such contract shall cease."

Mr. MADDEN. Would my colleague want to have the carriage of mail cease at the same time the contract ceases?

Mr. FOWLER. Not at all.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what would happen.

Mr. FOWLER. My amendment is offered for the purpose of making its carriage more certain. If it can not be carried by the party who has contracted to do it, then it is high time that you find a man or a corporation who has sufficient honor and respect for contracts to carry them out in the spirit of the law, for the good of the mail service of this country.

Mr. MADDEN. While there might be a dispute about whether it was being carried out or not, it might be wise to let the man continue to carry it until you could ascertain the facts. I do not think it would be a wise provision of law to say that the contractor must discontinue his work while the Government discontinues the pay arbitrarily.

Mr. FOWLER. It is not intended to discontinue the carriers, but it is intended to make the party who contracts to do the work perform it according to the contract.

Mr. MADDEN. It just provides to discontinue the pay.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who made the point of order, a question. Does this proposed amendment, in the form it is now, in the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, change existing law?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. In what respect?

Mr. MANN. The department is now authorized, I take it, to make contracts and to provide for penalties in the contract. Here is a proposition now expressly directing that where a violation of the contract is made, that the pay under the contract shall cease, although the contract itself, under existing law, may provide and does provide for the penalties which should be invoked for violations of the contract. It absolutely changes existing law.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I just came in, and I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this is not the provision in the railway postal laws providing for the transportation of mail by electric cars?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. To emphasize, then, the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], Mr. Chairman, that this does change existing law, it may be necessary to state the history of this provision. It was found in certain instances in the country, but very few, that under the extension of the trolleys the mail could be delivered by trolley not only cheaper than by the star route, but more expeditiously. In other words, it was the difference between the speed of a trolley and the speed of a star-route wagon, and to meet those cases a provision was inserted in the law years ago that where the road was not over 20 miles in length the Postmaster General might cause the mail to be transported by trolley at no greater expense than otherwise. That was the original language. I have not the bill before me as it reads now.

Now, under this provision of law, renewed annually, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], contracts have been made. I state this piece of history in order to emphasize the force of his statement that it does change existing law, because it applies to those contracts new law which did not apply to them heretofore, not being in existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offers an amendment to insert certain language after the word "service," in line 18. It seems to the Chair that the proposition contained in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois is broader even than that part of the legislation contained in the bill which is proposed as new legislation; that at the place at which it is offered, construing the section as a whole, it would apply to more of the bill than that part which is conceded to be new legislation in the bill; and, following the precedents, which the Chair will not take time to quote, but which he has examined, the Chair is of opinion that this comes under the inhibition of the rule, and the Chair sustains the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, does it not come under the Holman rule in that it is a limitation upon the appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman misconceives, or does not state accurately, what is called the Holman rule. That part of the Holman rule to which the gentleman refers provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Under the consistent rulings of various Chairmen and Speakers construing this rule, it has been held that it must clearly appear on the face of the amendment that it does propose to retrench expenditures in one of the ways suggested. The Chair holds that this does not so show, and therefore it does not come within the scope of the Holman rule.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Whenever such railway violates its contract of carriage of such mail, then one-half of the salary paid to such railway shall cease until such contract is complied with by such railroad.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Will the gentleman send his amendment to the desk? Has the gentleman his amendment prepared in writing?

Mr. FOWLER. No; I do not have it prepared in writing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to be captious, but I have noticed on several occasions recently that amendments have been dictated from the floor. Is it not a standing rule of the House that the whole amendment shall be presented in writing?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the fact, but, of course, it is of very frequent occurrence that a number of amendments are offered otherwise.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have been trying to follow the gentleman's argument, but it is impossible to get the amendment at the Clerk's desk, so that the importance of having the amendment in writing is apparent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that in practice the matter is largely a matter of discretion with the Chair. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] will now offer his amendment.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a rereading of the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yet sent up his amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to present my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 21, by inserting at the end of line 18 the following: "Provided, That whenever any railway shall violate its contract for such service then one-half of the pay for such service shall cease."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order against the amendment. Does the gentleman make it at this time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order. The Chair thinks that this comes within the reasoning of the first part of his ruling just made, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, is it not a reduction of the salary of the employee? Does it not come under that phase of the Holman rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it is in the form that brings it under that rule, the Chair will state.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I now renew my request that the Chair will rule on the question as to whether it is not essential that an amendment offered from the floor shall be in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary clerk at the Speaker's table has just handed to the Chair the following rule:

RULE XVI.

1. Every motion made to the House and entertained by the Speaker shall be reduced to writing on the demand of any Member, and it shall be entered on the Journal in the name of the Member making it, unless it is withdrawn the same day.

It would seem that if a Member proposes an amendment it is within the power of any other Member to demand that it shall be reduced to writing. Otherwise it seems to be in the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, on the contrary, if no one does object to a verbal amendment the verbal amendment will stand?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a matter resting in the discretion of the Chair, evidently. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of foreign mails, $3,900,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General shall be authorized to expend such sums as may be necessary, not exceeding $112,800, to cover one-half of the cost of transportation, compensation, and expenses of clerks to be employed in assorting and pouching mails in transit on steamships between the United States and other postal administrations in the International Postal Union, and not exceeding $88,100 for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in New York Bay to the steamship and railway piers, and for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in San Francisco Bay to the piers; also for transferring the mail from steamships performing service under contract for transporting United States mail: Provided, That acting clerks may be employed in place of clerks or substitutes injured while on duty who shall be granted leave of absence with full pay during the period of disability, but not exceeding one year, then at the rate of 50 per cent of the clerk's annual salary for the period of disability exceeding 1 year but not exceeding 12 months additional, and that the Postmaster General may pay the sum of $2,000, which shall be exempt from payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representative of any sea-post clerk or substitute sea-post clerk who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to come in after the word "cover," in line 22, page 21. I move to strike out the balance of that line, lines 23 and 24, and all of line 1 on page 22, and the word "union," which is the first word in line 2 on page 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The cost to the United States of maintaining seaport service on steamships conveying the mails.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 22, after the word "cover," strike out all the remainder of that line and all of lines 23 and 24 and all of line 1 on page 22, and the word "union" at the beginning of line 2, and insert the following: "The cost to the United States of maintaining seaport service on steamships conveying the mails."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, what does that amendment do?

Mr. MANN. It makes it conform to existing law.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is the recommendation of the department.

Mr. MANN. It accomplishes the same purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in line 6 I move to strike out the word "piers" and insert the following:

And for transferring the foreign mails from incoming steamships at Honolulu from quarantine to the piers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 6, strike out the word "piers" and insert the following: "And for transferring the foreign mails from incoming steamships at Honolulu from quarantine to the piers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word and asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Missouri desire to insert in the RECORD at this point a speech upon some other subject, or will the gentleman get leave to insert it at the end of the RECORD?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not quite understand.

Mr. MANN. I am very much opposed to the getting of leave to extend, and then inserting in the actual proceedings of the House speeches relating to some other matter. If the gentleman will obtain leave to insert his remarks at the end of the RECORD if they do not relate to postal matters, I shall have no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The matter I intend to insert relates to post roads. It relates to the bill in general, but does not belong at this particular point in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Then will the gentleman insert it in the RECORD at the end of the proceedings, where such insertions are usually made?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. To insert a long speech into the actual proceedings, which the Members read, makes it inconvenient.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask if it is within the power of a Member of the House to designate the place in the RECORD where a printed speech may be placed? I appreciate the point of the gentleman's objection, that the continuity of the proceedings ought not to be broken by the insertion of matter that does not relate to the subject. Has the gentleman from Missouri any power to designate the place where his speech shall be printed?

Mr. MANN. He has. If he gets leave to print now and gives his remarks to the reporters, they may be put in at this place in the proceedings, or he can ask them to put it in the latter part of the RECORD, where speeches are printed that are held out for revision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have a similar request to make, but I make it with the understanding that I will withhold the copy until to-morrow.

Mr. BORLAND. I will make my request in the same way. I have no desire to print the speech at this particular point in the proceedings.

Mr. MANN. I did not suppose the gentleman had.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the request with the understanding that the speech be printed at the end of the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel and miscellaneous expenses in the postal service, office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, $1,000.

Mr. CULLOP. I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 24, on page 22, insert the following: "That the Executive order of date September 30, 1910, whereby assistant postmasters and clerks at first and second class post offices were placed within the classified civil service, and the Executive order of October 15, 1912, whereby postmasters of the fourth class were placed within the classified civil service, are hereby annulled and set aside."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman just what will be accomplished by this amendment if it is agreed to? I did not quite catch its import. Do I understand from the amendment that it is proposed to take out of the classified service all of the clerks in first and second class post offices; and if so, would it include carriers as well?

Mr. CULLOP. No, sir; it does not. It only embraces the assistant postmasters and clerks in first and second class offices included in the Executive order of September 30, 1910, placing them in the classified civil service. The other relates to fourth-class postmasters, annulling the order of October 15, 1912, whereby they were placed under the classified civil service and given life positions. That is the object of it, and these are the only classes of officials which it affects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment, it is proposed to take out of the classified service the assistant postmasters in the first and second class offices and also the postmasters in the fourth-class offices. In other words, to take out of the merit system these officers and return them to the spoils system of politics. I am quite willing to submit that to a vote of Congress. I shall watch with great interest to see how gentlemen are recorded upon it, not because it will make any difference to me, but just to see the squirming that will be done now and hereafter. We already have one proposition upon which we will get a roll call on the subject, and I would like to see one that is effective, for the first one will not amount to much, except to give an opportunity to express an opinion. I do not know whether the President would pay any attention to the provision or not.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I want to see what this applies to. It appears to apply to assistant postmasters and clerks at first and second class offices.

Mr. MANN. That is what I understood it applied to.

Mr. CANNON. It applies to the first and second class offices and clerks within the classified service in the Executive order of September 30, 1910, whereby assistant postmasters and clerks at first and second class offices, as well as to the order of 1912 as to the fourth-class postmasters. Does the gentleman know what clerks besides the assistant postmasters this would cover?

Mr. MANN. I do not. I inquired of the gentleman from Indiana, who offered the amendment, and was assured that it did not cover any clerks, as I understood it. Unless I misunderstood the gentleman, he stated that the first part of the order only covered, in fact, assistant postmasters.

Mr. CULLOP. And clerks,

Mr. MANN. I know that the gentleman did not intend to mislead me.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana says "and clerks under the order of 1910."

Mr. MANN. Whatever it may be, I regret that the gentleman is not willing to go the whole hog. If I wanted to put myself on record in advocacy of the spoils system, I would propose to take all of the employees of the postal service out of the merit system and give them to my party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to ascertain gentlemen's opinion as to the effect of this amendment. What is it going to do? There is a civil-service law 20 or 35 years old which gives to the President such power. In 1910 and 1912 the President exercised the powers given him by that statute and issued two Executive orders placing two classes of employees in the civil service. This amendment, if I understand it, proposes to revoke those two orders, but not to change the statute by its terms. If the amendment does not change the statute, if it simply revokes the orders, the President might sign the act to-day and reissue the orders to-morrow. Indeed, the orders might be written and lie on the desk and be signed one minute or a half a minute after the bill itself was signed. Is that the purpose of the amendment? Is it the gentleman's construction that the revocation of these orders is an amendment to the civil-service law, a provision of permanent law that two classes of employees shall never, under that act, be placed in the civil service? Which is the construction of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New Jersey, I have set out the language in this amendment just as it was given me by the First Assistant Postmaster General, and that is, by the Executive order of September 30, 1910, assistant postmasters and clerks in first and second class post offices were placed within the classified civil service, and that by the President's order of October 15, 1912, postmasters of the fourth class were also placed within the classified civil service.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I will, although I have only five minutes.

Mr. HAMILL. Who appoints the clerks and assistant postmasters in the first-class offices?

Mr. CULLOP. As a rule the postmaster at the post office appoints, subject to approval, I think, in nearly every instance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois that this is one of the emanations growing out of the desire for spoils. Let me say in answer that these men were put in office under the spoils system, many of them appointed just before the order of September 30, 1910, went into effect. The fourth-class postmasters were selected under the spoils system, and now it is proposed by Executive order to fasten them upon the country for life as a result of the work of the spoilsmen of this country. Is it not better to annul those orders, and if you are to enforce this branch of the law in the selection of these officers, let them be selected according to merit and not according to their political affiliations, for their work in the party which is just going out of power? They were selected upon that theory; that is how they came into office; and it is proposed now by these Executive orders to put them in office and keep them for life. I am opposed to the policy and the country is opposed to it. A large number of the opposite party is opposed to it because they know the manner in which their selection was brought about and the manner in which it is proposed now to keep them in office. This Congress is not repealing any statute by this amendment, but simply annulling two of the Executive orders of the President of the United States in reference to these officers.

A man who gets an office for life does not have the ambition to improve the service that a man has who is dependent upon his good, efficient work in holding his office. The inducement for the improvement of the service is taken away. But the thing we are interested in is to revoke these orders and rebuke the attempt to foist the spoils system upon the country through the Executive orders, and thereby enable officials to be kept in office for life when the administration of this country is about to change, and when there is a great desire to improve the public service by inducting new blood in official circles.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman state how long since these orders have been made?

Mr. CULLOP. The one in reference to fourth-class postmasters, affecting over 40,000 officeholders, was made on the 15th of October, 1912, just 19 days before the election. The other one was made September 30, 1910, and between the issuance of the order and the taking effect, December 1, 1910, all over the country there were removals of assistant postmasters and new assistant postmasters appointed to take their place, selected to go into the service after these orders were made and before they became operative. These, in many instances, were made in violation of good public service and as a reward for political activity, and all selected from the Republican Party. Selections were made from that party alone in all such instances, and it could not be contended it was solely for the good of the public service. It was a mere political action that was taken to reward political service by the changes that were made.

Mr. HAMILL. Assuming that it was and that these men have given satisfactory service and have shown evidences of their continuing to give satisfactory service, does not the gentleman think that the order should be allowed to stand?

Mr. CULLOP. No, I do not; and they have not in all cases given satisfactory service. The vote of the people on the 4th day of last November repudiated their service and demanded a change in the holding of the offices throughout the country.

Mr. HAMILL. As a general principle, does not the gentleman believe that life tenure should be the rule in Government service?

Mr. CULLOP. Never, in any service. It is a detriment rather than a benefit to good service. It takes from a man the inspiration to render good service, because he is fixed for life, and there is not any reason why he should be more active and diligent in the discharge of his official duties; and for that reason it is not in the interest of good service. But it is contended that this amendment is in furtherance of the "spoils system." I deny it. The Executive orders which it proposes to annul were in support of the spoils system, because each and every officer embraced under said orders were selected under the spoils system as a reward for political service and not because of superior qualifications.

If they were really in aid of good service, for the improvement of the discharge of public duties, why not make such an Executive order, but open all the places to selection anew, and select them from all applicants in competitive examinations? This would be fair and would then sustain the claim that the same was done for the purpose of improving the public service and for the good advantage of the discharge of official duties.

We are all for good civil service; we believe in the faithful and efficient discharge of official duties; but we can not, however, agree that these two Executive orders were calculated to improve the public service or inspire a better discharge of official duties. If so, fairness in this matter requires that these orders be annulled and the matter thrown open to competitive examinations, where all may participate, and the selections made on merit and not, as has been done in these cases, as reward for partisan political service.

For these reasons I hope the amendment will be adopted. It is against it more than in favor of it, and the sooner the policy is changed the better. I am opposed, I may say, to any life tenure of office, because fixed terms of office inspire the occupant of the office to better service and to greater activity.

It may be said "that to the victor belong the spoils," I indorse that doctrine. I believe any business can better be operated by its friends than its enemies; that the administration of public affairs can better be administered by those friendly to its policies than by those hostile to them. This, I take it, no one will deny, because we insist upon this doctrine does not mean we are opposed to good public service. It can not be so construed, but on the contrary it means we favor a good public service, and are desirous of securing only the best by placing the administration of the public business in the hands of competent officials in full sympathy with the policies of the incoming administration, which is charged with the responsibility thereof. It is with this object in view we advocate the adoption of this aniendment.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, it is quite singular that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] and I should draw opposite conclusions from the same facts. My contention is, and I believe it is borne out by all experience, that life service, assured tenure in public office, is one of the greatest inspirations we can have toward making public servants faithful and diligent. The curse of this country has been the old spoils system, which happily has been done away with by recent legislation. If we give a man an assurance that so long as he is faithful to his work his tenure will not be molested, then we have a man whose undivided attention and industry is given to his work; but if a man is working with the sword of Damocles hanging over his head every moment of his time, then we have a man who instead of attending with undivided industry and attention to his work, is always fearing the appointing authority, and he can not give faithful service to the Government. I think that any measure that would be a blow at civil service ought to be spurned by the Members of this House. I know that in taking a position whereby assistant postmasters could be removed I would be doing something which, from the point of view of patronage, would be very beneficial to myself. I believe, however, that since we have established civil service and recognized life tenure, this House would make a mistake at this time if it passed any legislation that would menace or imperil the continuance of that meritorious and experience-proven system. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] what class of clerks was placed under civil service in the first and second class post office by the Executive order of 1910, and how many of them were embraced in that class or classes?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I have not that information. I wrote to the First Assistant Postmaster General, but he did not give me a detailed statement of it; but it applies to deputy postmasters and clerks in the first and second class offices, the assistants and the clerks in the offices, and not the carriers. I only wish that the amendment applied to them as well.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I had understood that the clerks in the postal service were all under civil service prior to 1910.

Mr. CULLOP. Not in these offices.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. In the first and second class offices?

Mr. CULLOP. That is my understanding from the Postmaster General. It was true of the third class.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon this vote the ayes are 15 and the noes 11——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Chair had announced the result and that the demand for tellers came too late.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Chair that the Members could not tell how the vote went until the Chair had announced it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had stated that the ayes were 15 and the noes 11, and upon that came the demand for tellers. The gentleman from New Jersey was in time. As many as favor ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Fourteen Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-four Members are present; not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if that amendment is agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced that the ayes were 15 and the noes 11. It was at this stage that the point of order of no quorum was made. The Chair has held there is no quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. GARRETT, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had found itself without a quorum; that he had directed the roll to be called; that 216 Members had answered to their names, a quorum; and he reported the list of absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that the question is on the demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is well taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may we have order so that we may know what the point of order is?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had stated that the question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]. Thereupon the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] made the point of order that the question was upon the demand for tellers on that amendment. It seems to the Chair that the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is well taken.

Mr. CULLOP. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. The motion for tellers had been voted down, and the Chair so declared as I understood it. Then the Chair announced that the amendment was adopted, and not until then was the point of no quorum made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL]. Now, what I inquire of the Chair is, the proceedings having gone that far, was not the amendment already adopted before the point of no quorum was raised?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the situation is this: The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] proposed an amendment, which was discussed for some 15 or 20 minutes, and the vote was then had viva voce. The Chair stated that "The noes seemed to have it," whereupon a division was demanded, and the House divided. The minutes show that the Chair stated:

Upon this vote the ayes are 15, and the noes 11.

Whereupon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] demanded tellers, and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] demanded tellers.

Then the following occurred:

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Chair had announced the result and that the demand for tellers came too late.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Chair that the Members could not tell how the vote went until the Chair had announced it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had stated that the ayes were 15 and the noes 11, and upon that came the demand for tellers. The gentleman from New Jersey was in time. As many as favor ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Fourteen Members have arisen—not a sufficient number—and tellers are refused. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Now, it seems perfectly apparent to the Chair that, under the constitutional provision as to a quorum, had these proceedings been in the House, upon the point of no quorum coming at the time it did, and in the connection in which it did, necessarily it would have vacated the proceedings and brought the matter to an issue in another way. It seems to the Chair that the rule must be construed in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in the same spirit and in the same manner as would apply in the House. Therefore the Chair thinks that the demand for tellers is in order.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will state it.

Mr. MANN. I understand the Chair has sustained the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had so stated.

Mr. MANN. I shall not appeal from the decision of the Chair, because I think it makes no difference. I am quite sure that when the Chair reflects upon it hereafter the Chair will change its judgment upon that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very anxious to proceed in order.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Now is as good a time as any for the Chair to change his decision.

Mr. MANN. This particular matter makes no difference. I think when the present occupant of the chair, who is a very able parliamentarian, thinks the matter over he will see that the ruling he now makes is not logical with the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. On the motion for tellers or——

Mr. MANN. On the point made by the gentleman from Virginia about tellers.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, is not the purpose of the announcement of the Chair that either "the ayes or noes seem to have it" to give opportunity to anyone who wants to demand a vote some other way to make that demand between that announcement and the announcement that "the ayes or noes have it," whichever way the Chair has decided? Now, that has been a practice ever since I have been a Member of the House, and after the Chair has made an announcement, I think if the Chair will look up the precedents on this subject he will find that frequently Speakers and Chairmen have ruled that way. In other words, the matter was adopted or rejected, but the point of no quorum can be raised at any time in order to get a quorum in the committee to do business. That is the point I am insisting on, and I believe the precedents abundantly sustain this view of the matter.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, just in this connection I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. There were two stages in this matter. The announcement of the Chair was made with respect to the first stage. In the next stage the call was made for tellers, and the call was not sustained. Then the point of no quorum was made. The announcement of the Chair was to the effect that by the vote prior to the call for tellers, the amendment had been agreed to. When the request was made for tellers, and the vote was taken on that request, it was made apparent that no quorum was present. Thereupon the point of order of no quorum was made. On the discovery that no quorum was present, the action taken in respect to tellers thereby became of no effect.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] yield right there?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. After the demand for tellers was refused because not a sufficient number of gentlemen arose to command tellers, the Chairman announced that the amendment had been adopted.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That has already been stated. The facts in that connection have already been given, namely, that the amendment was agreed to by the first vote, but in connection with the gentleman's request for tellers, the point was made of no quorum, and when that point was made and the fact of no quorum was ascertained everything that was done in relation to tellers was of no effect. The Committee of the Whole can no more act without a quorum than the full House.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman has misunderstood the reading of the RECORD. The Chair read the RECORD. It was after all that the gentleman has mentioned had taken place that the Chair announced that the amendment was adopted and before a point of no quorum had been made.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That, of course, must be determined by reference to the RECORD.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order I made.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If I apprehend the reading of the RECORD, the ruling made by the Chair is logical and appropriate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] made the point of order that the question was on the demand for tellers. The Chair presumes the language used by the Chair was such as to show that the Chair sustained that point of order, although the Chair's first impression was otherwise. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] now states that he desires to withdraw that point of order. By unanimous consent those proceedings will be vacated, and the Chair will hold that the matter comes up de novo upon the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be stated again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 22, after line 24, insert the following: "That the Executive order of date September 30, 1910, whereby assistant postmasters and clerks at first and second class post offices were placed within the classified civil service, and the Executive order of October 18, 1912, whereby fourth-class postmasters were placed within the classified civil service, are hereby annulled and set aside."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. CULLOP. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 18.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it appropriate to take notice of the fact at this time that the Members on the Republican side are not voting? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It is improper to make the statement. If the gentleman understood the proprieties he would not be willing to take a chance about that. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that that is a parliamentary inquiry. On this vote the ayes are 49 and the noes 18. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REILLY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CULLOP. And I make the point, Mr. Chairman, that that is dilatory.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten gentlemen are present—a quorum. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] demands tellers.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order now that that demand comes too late. The Chair has announced the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] demanded tellers as soon as the vote was announced before.

Mr. CULLOP. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The Chair is more courteous than the gentleman from Indiana knows how to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that upon the conclusion of the vote by tellers the Chair announced that the ayes were 49 and noes were 18. Thereupon the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] was observed by the Chair to be standing, and the Chair hesitated. The Chair understood the gentleman from Connecticut to say, "Mr. Chairman—" and he stopped. The gentleman did not pursue it, and the Chair then very deliberately stated, "The ayes have it." The Chair thinks the demand of the gentleman from Connecticut, in view of the situation, came too late.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, it has been the invariable practice, and that is the rule laid down in Jefferson's Manual, that the demand for tellers comes after the announcement of the result of a vote on a division.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is nothing before the House, and I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] requested that we return to page 17 to consider the item at the foot of that page. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] submits a request that the committee return to the last paragraph on page 17. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Clerk will report the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $49,000,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that proviso. My point is that this amendment is new legislation, changing existing law; and further, that there is nothing in this amendment appearing on its face to indicate that its adoption will result in retrenchment, and for that reason I insist that it is in direct conflict with Rule XXI of the House. That is the point that I make.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard further on his point of order at this time?

Mr. RODENBERG. If some one objects to the point, I want to be heard.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I intend to resist the point of order. I think that the amendment that has been placed in the bill by the committee, to wit—

That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis—is saved by the proviso at the end of the second clause of Rule XXI of the House. As the Chair knows, that second clause is one which defines limitations in the form of amendments to appropriation bills, and contains the well-known general statement that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Now, I believe that the following proviso is the one which protects this amendment from a successful point of order. The proviso is as follows:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

I want to call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that there may be a material difference between the reduction of an appropriation and a retrenchment in the expenditures under that appropriation. The lump-sum appropriation for this service carried in this bill is $49,000,000. As a matter of fact, if the amendment should stay in the bill and become a law, then there would be an expenditure of less than $49,000,000. I ask the Chairman to follow me while I visualize the situation as it exists.

The St. Louis Terminal Association controls the station and the tracks leading thereto from all directions in the city of St. Louis, but the St. Louis Terminal Association receives pay as a separate entity only on that part of the mail which comes into St. Louis over one of the bridges leading into the city from the east. I point out to the Chairman that the tracks leading into St. Louis from the west are owned by the same terminal association, but pay is not given to the terminal association for the transportation of mail over the tracks which lead into St. Louis from that direction, but only on the tracks that lead across the river from the east, and over one bridge, the Eads Bridge. Pay is given for the transportation of the mail in St. Louis in two ways. We have a statute which provides pay for the transportation of mail by the railroads on the amount of mail transported, with the weight multiplied by the distance carried and fixed upon a graduated scale of rates; and on all mail that comes into the terminal station at St. Louis the mileage system of pay for the transportation of mail is used except in the one instance. But we have another law, which I now wish to read to the Chairman. It is brief, and is as follows:

That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to pay, from appropriations for transportation by railroad routes, for the special transfer and terminal service between the Union Station and East St. Louis, Ill., and the Union Station and St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting and heating of mail buildings and the transfer service at St. Louis, at a rate of not exceeding $50,000 per annum, beginning on the 1st day of July, 1899.

That is the law under which the Government now pays to the St. Louis Terminal Association $50,000 a year out of this lump sum of $49,000,000. I want to point out to the Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the $50,000 paid for transportation, as well as for the other things mentioned in the act which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the Chair that it is. The $50,000 is a payment for the transportation of the mail, first, from East St. Louis to the terminal at St. Louis, a distance of 3.80 miles, and for heating and lighting rooms in the station and for transfer service in the station.

Now, if the proviso which the committee has included in the bill should become law, then the Government, as I will show a little later, will pay the St. Louis Terminal Association a sum of money based on the mileage charge between East St. Louis and St. Louis, which, according to the report of the Post Office Department, will reach the sum of $19,000. So there can be no question at all about the fact that this amendment will result in a retrenchment in expenditures.

The committee does not assume to change the total of the lump-sum appropriation, but by the very nature of things—and a long history will bear me out in this—the amendment places the payment for the transportation of that mail on a mileage basis and results, as the department says, in a reduction of some $19,000 a year.

In that connection I am not merely making the argument for the purpose of carrying out my own point of view, but I find that since this was last in controversy in this House—and it has been up very frequently for discussion—there has been published a report from the department in which it recommends that this change shall be made, and states that a saving will be accomplished.

I call the attention of the chairman to the fact Rule XXI can be construed strictly and narrowly and to the letter, or on the other hand it can be construed broadly, and for my part I would like to see the so-called Holman provisions of the rule given the broadest sort of construction.

If an individual Member of the House, without the authorization of the committee, should offer this amendment as I have done myself repeatedly in the past, I can see where the contention of the gentleman from Illinois and his point of order might be well taken; but where, under the provisions of this rule, a committee has regularly, following the rule, reported an amendment which does retrench expenditures, then I do not believe that the point of order should lie against it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I was asking recognition in my own right. I thought the gentleman from Kansas had concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois in a few moments. The Chair desires to propound a question to the gentleman from Kansas. Assuming, as the gentleman does, that this provision depends wholly upon the Holman rule, and that it would not be in order unless in order under the Holman rule, the Chair wishes to ask the gentleman if he has examined the ruling of Mr. Speaker Kerr, which is the first ruling on the Holman rule, and subsequent rulings, particularly a ruling by Mr. Chairman SAUNDERS, of Virginia, in the last session of Congress on the Army bill, the substance of which was that any amendment or legislation so proposed must show clearly upon its face that it is a retrenchment. If so, what has the gentleman to say as to this amendment showing that upon its face?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have read the decision of Chairman SAUNDERS and the decision of the present occupant of the Chair, and also a decision by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]; and, if my recollection serves me right, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] ruled that where a substantial reduction was apparent from the context and from the provision itself, it came within the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly that is the rule, but the question is, taking the amendment of the committee or the proviso placed in the bill by the committee in connection with the original act which the gentleman from Kansas has read, which lodges discretion in the Postmaster General with respect to this matter, can the Chair, without extraneous information, determine from the act and the proviso itself that it does work a retrenchment?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is precisely my contention. The gentleman from Illinois contends that an amendment to come within the Holman rule must show upon its face a reduction, and it is my belief that the Chairman can see by the very nature of the amendment that it does mean a reduction, certainly not an increase. The Chairman must know that an amendment of this kind can not result in an increase. We have the general statute which provides for the pay of the railroads for the carriage of the mails on a certain system, and the Chair has a right to consider that general rule for the payment of railroads. I want to repeat that the Chair has a right to consider that we have one general law which applies to all railroads in the pay for the transportation of the mails on a railroad, and that an amendment thereto which restricts the pay for the carriage of the mail or the handling of the mail to that one general statute providing for payment—the Chair has a right to consider that that is necessarily a reduction, which it is in fact.

I want to say, further, to the Chairman, however he may decide, that a study of the chronological history of the item itself proves this very matter. The old Eads Bridge was constructed in 1875, and thereafter for some 20 years there was carried currently in appropriation bills a law which gave $25,000 a year for the transportation of the mail for these 3½ miles across the bridge and its housing and transfer at St. Louis. In 1899 we made the provision permanent law, and it has continued now for 12 or 13 years as permanent law.

No one contends, I think, for a moment—and I do not think the gentlemn from Illinois will contend—that this amendment or proviso would result in increasing the pay of the St. Louis Terminal Association. It will result in a reduction. It was written for that purpose, and the history of the item shows that it will result in that way, and I believe the chairman of the committee has a right to consider the bearing on the subject of the fact that we pay for the transportation of mails in one general statute and that the amendment to a law restricting any payment to that one general statute where the carriage of the mails is involved must necessarily result in a reduction of the expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair again? The proviso of the committee reads:

That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis.

The act from which the gentleman from Kansas has read and of which the Chair has a copy before him, provides:

SEC. 3. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to pay from appropriations for transportation by railroad routes for the special transfer and terminal service between the Union Station at East St. Louis, Ill., and the Union Station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of mail building and the transfer service at St. Louis at the rate of not exceeding $50,000 per annum, beginning on the 1st day of July, 1889.

The discretionary act, if it may be so termed, seems to the Chair much broader than the proviso of the committee. Is the gentleman from Kansas sure that if the committee's proviso were to pass that it would repeal the entire special act or would it simply repeal it pro tanto?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will show to the Chair where it would repeal that act, because the act which he has just quoted provides that "the Postmaster General is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to pay from the appropriations for transportation by railroad routes," and if the payment can not be made except from this item, certainly it can not be paid from any other item of appropriations in this or any other bill, and that amount of appropriation would fail and cease to be available.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, there is no other appropriation out of which this service can be paid for. Now, if under the Holman Act we reduce expenditures through the restriction upon the way in which that money shall be expended, namely, the lump sum of $49,000,000, it seems to me that under these circumstances it must come within the rule. It certainly does limit the discretion which the special act the Chair has just mentioned gives to the Postmaster General. He now can pay not to exceed $50,000 for the special transfer of the mail, the heating and lighting of the buildings, and for the carriage of the mail included, but the minute this amendment is adopted and becomes law, then the Postmaster General is able to pay only for the transportation of mail over the St. Louis bridge on a mileage basis.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the point that came into the mind of the Chair, in an attempt to construe the act, as to whether or not, if the proviso shall be held in order and become a law, the Postmaster General can not, under it and under the other special act, pay on a mileage basis for carrying the mails, and then, if in his discretion he sees fit to do so, pay all the balance for the other special things mentioned in the special act.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am glad the Chairman asked that question, because I can answer positively no. There is no pay to any of the 14 railroads which cross Eads bridge into St. Louis for transportation of the mail from East St. Louis to St. Louis. All the mail routes at present cease at the station at East St. Louis, and all the pay that is given for the transportation of the mail from the bridge over to St. Louis is in this payment of $50,000. Answering the Chairman's question strictly, the Postmaster General, if this amendment should pass, would pay the 14 railroads for transportation of mail from East St. Louis to St. Louis on a mileage basis, and would not be enabled to pay any money whatever from any source in this or any other appropriation bill to the Terminal Co. for heat, lighting, special transfer, and so forth.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to address myself to the merits of the transfer service across the bridge to St. Louis, but I will confine myself to a discussion of the parliamentary situation. I do not claim to have much familiarity with the rules of this House, but I do know that the decisions of every Speaker and every Chairman who has been called upon to construe the so-called Holman rule sets forth in clear and unmistakable language that amendments on an appropriation bill, to be in order under that rule, must indicate on its face that, if adopted, it will result in retrenchment and reduction of expenditures.

My contention is that this amendment does not indicate anything of that kind. The act of March 1, 1899, under which the Terminal Railroad Association is now being paid for this service, and which has been read by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and also by the Chairman, expressly states that compensation shall be paid not only for carrying the mail across the bridge, but also for the special transfer and terminal service, including the use, lighting, and heating of mail buildings. It must be noted by every member of the committee that compensation is provided for for service in addition to carrying the mail. It must also be noted that the whole matter of payment is addressed to the discretion of the Postmaster General. He may pay for all of this service any sum that he sees fit to pay, so long as it is not in excess of $50,000. This amendment specifically directs payment for one of the items covered in the general act, that of carrying the mail alone. It must certainly be apparent that this kind of limitation is not a retrenchment, because no one can tell in what manner the Postmaster General will exercise that discretion. I undertake to say, further, that if this amendment should be adopted it might result in an increase of expenditures. The Post Office Department would be called upon to pay upon a mileage basis for carrying the mail across the bridge, and under the general act the Postmaster General might in his discretion still pay not to exceed $50,000 for the other service that is performed at that point, and if the gentleman's statement is correct, and the estimate of the Second Assistant Postmaster General is correct, and the payment on mileage basis will amount to $19,000, then, if the Postmaster General should in the exercise of his discretion conclude to pay the maximum amount of $50,000, the amendment of the committee would result not in a retrenchment, but in an increase, instead of a decrease in expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that the act of March 1, 1899, is a discretionary act. It places certain discretionary authority in the hands of the Postmaster General, and I contend, further, that so long as that discretion is lodged in the Postmaster General no amendment can be incorporated in this appropriation bill which will clearly set forth that it will result in a retrenchment, because there is no way of determining just how the Postmaster General may exercise his discretion. He could now under the general law pay less than $19,000 for all of the service at St. Louis. He could pay $10,000. He could pay $5,000. He can pay less than the sum that would be fixed by compensation on the mileage basis. Therefore I contend that you can not, as long as that discretionary power is lodged in the Postmaster General, and so long as there is no way of determining how that discretion will be exercised, put an amendment on this appropriation bill that will absolutely guarantee a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into this discussion, but it seems to me that there is no way of proceeding to the consideration of this question without first meeting the legal question that presents itself on the face of the bill. Does this proviso repeal the special act? If the answer be no, then all the contentions that the amendment is in order fall. There is nothing in the suggestion that there will be no fund from which to pay the money if this proviso goes in, unless it be first held that it repeals the special act, because as long as the special act stands there will be authority in the Postmaster General to pay the $50,000. That is clear, as the law reads and has been read to the Chair. That is the only suggestion I mean to make. This amendment does nothing that brings it within any rule unless it be first held that it repeals the special act.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, just a word before the Chair rules. I think it should be stated in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] and in answer to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER], what has not been hitherto stated, and that is this, that there is no general law in the United States which provides payments to railway companies for the housing or transfer of mails at stations.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. But that special law does.

Mr. MURDOCK. That special law does.

Mr. RODENBERG. And you must repeal it first.

Mr. MURDOCK. And under that one special law the Terminal Association is paid out of this sum specifically named here $50,000 for two services, namely, the handling of the mail from East St. Louis to St. Louis and the transfer of the mails in the station there at St. Louis.

Mr. RODENBERG. And for furnishing of mail facilities.

Mr. MURDOCK. And heating and lighting. In case of a limitation in this appropriation bill which provides that the Postmaster General can not pay for the handling of that mail across the Mississippi River, save on a mileage basis, then, as a matter of fact, without any question, that limitation would repeal the force and effect of the special law which gives compensation for the handling and transfer of the mail in the St. Louis station. If there were a general law in this country providing for the pay to railways for the handling of mail and the transfer of it in stations and for the heating and lighting of mail rooms in the station, then my argument would fall to the ground; but inasmuch as there is no general statute to that effect, then the passage of this amendment would put upon the Postmaster General, no matter who he was, the necessity of paying to the 14 railroads which use the Eads Bridge pay on the mileage basis, and would prevent the Postmaster General from giving any compensation to the St. Louis Terminal Association for the use of rooms in the station.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. It has been conceded by all participating in this discussion that if the provision be in order it is made in order by the latter part of the so-called Holman Rule, which reads:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

This measure, if presented as an original bill, would, of course, go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads under the rules of the House. Therefore the committee which brings it in as an integral part of this bill is the committee which should have jurisdiction of it, standing as independent legislation, and therefore no objection could lie on that score.

But the question in the mind of the Chair, and which has given the Chair considerable trouble, is whether this meets the requirement of the Holman rule or that provision of the Holman rule as to retrenchment, and whether it shows upon its face satisfactorily, not necessarily conclusively, but to such an extent as that a reasonable man looking at the proposal and measuring it by the act which it proposes to alter, would say it was a retrenchment. The Chair is not at all satisfied that if this proviso should become a law that it would repeal all of the original act. The Chair will read it again:

SEC. 3. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to pay from appropriations for transportation by railroad routes for the special transfer and terminal service between the Union Station at East St. Louis, Ill., and the Union Station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of mail building and the transfer service at St. Louis, at the rate of not exceeding $50,000 per annum, beginning on the 1st day of July, 1889.

That is the law of the land. Whether it is wise or unwise, whether it is just or unjust, the Chair does not know, nor does it concern the Chair at this stage of the proceedings. But evidently that act, on its face, at least, does provide for the payment for something besides the transfer or the carrying of the mails. That is to say, it lodges discretion in the Postmaster General to pay for something besides the carrying of the mails across that bridge, out of this particular fund, if he deems it proper. Now, the language of the proviso is:

That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis other than upon a mileage basis.

Suppose that becomes the law? Is not there still left to the Postmaster General a discretion he can exercise in paying for lighting, heating, and so forth? Upon the facts of it, it seems to the Chair that unquestionably there is; and, therefore, it does not touch the discretion of the Postmaster General, except upon one particular of the whole sum of items for which he is permitted to pay in his discretion—that is, the matter of carrying—and that being the case, it only touching that single item, how can the Chair possibly say that upon its face it shows a retrenchment such as is required to be done to make it in order under the Holman rule?

The Chair has given considerable attention to this matter and considerable study, and does not think that it shows upon its face that it works a retrenchment such as is required under the Holman rule; and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we return to page 19 for the purpose of an amendment, as suggested by the House action.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] asks unanimous consent to return to page 19, to the paragraph which was there passed.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will withhold his request until I offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] will be recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment to the section. Does he desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph which has just been passed?

Mr. JACKSON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read a portion of the amendment, as follows:

Amend, line 21, page 17, by striking out "$49,000,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000"; and by adding thereto:

"Provided, That no part of such appropriation shall be used in transporting mail matter consisting in any part of any letter, circular, packet, newspaper, magazine, or other periodical advertising for sale, either directly or indirectly, any spirituous, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors for transmission to or delivery in any State, county, municipality wherein the sale of such liquors is or may be hereafter prohibited by State law, or when like pieces of mail matter are intended to promote the sale of stocks, shares, bonds, or other forms of indebtedness, of any corporation, company, or association, unless the same have first been inspected and approved by the Postmaster General as free from intended fraud upon purchasers and proper to be introduced into the mails of the United States."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make a point of order upon the proviso to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order upon the proviso to the section.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. He reduces the amount from $48,000,000 to $45,000,000; that is not subject to a point of order; but to the balance of the amendment I make a point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Will not the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I will not reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman now insist on the point of order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make it now.

Mr. JACKSON. I would like to have the Clerk conclude the reading of the amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But I shall insist on the point of order being discussed alone, and not a lot of prohibition rot, in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation for the purpose of weighing the mails and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid the railway companies for transporting the mails by excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kansas upon the point of order.

Mr. JACKSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not offered for the purpose of exploiting what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is pleased to call "prohibition rot." There is not any such thing as prohibition rot among well-informed people, and I regret very much that the gentleman is pleased to meet this amendment by attempting to indulge in such unparliamentary language.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman is discussing the point of order?

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not responsible for the gentleman's inability to understand the English language.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand the English language, but you are responsible, though, for making a statement here to the committee on the point of order that is not in order.

Mr. JACKSON. I refuse to yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I insist on the rule that the gentleman discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] will proceed in order.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I was attempting to do so. Now, I shall not attempt to review the decisions which have just been cited to the Chair upon the amendment offered by my colleague or the decisions referred to by the Chair in his decision except in so far as I think they are applicable to this rule. And so far as that is concerned, the merit of the proposition is involved in the point of order, because the merit of the proposition, if it has any, is involved in this attempt to retrench expenditures under this appropriation.

Now I call the attention of the Chair, in the first place, to the fact that the amendment upon its face does reduce the amount of the appropriation. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] concedes that so much of the amendment is in order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Concedes what? Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall insist that we have order and that the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads observe order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman if he would yield. He said I conceded something. I want to know what it is.

Mr. JACKSON. I will repeat what I said, for the benefit of the gentleman. I said that the chairman conceded that so much of the amendment as reduced the amount of the appropriation is in order. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the amendment proceeds to provide for a reduction of the amount of money that is to be paid out of the Treasury. So that for two reasons the amendment comes within the Holman rule. I concede that if it were not for the Holman rule it would not be in order, because, while it is a limitation upon the appropriation, it does change existing law and directs the Postmaster General to take certain procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit the Chair a question right there?

Mr. JACKSON. In just a moment. I desire now to call the Chair's attention to the very point which the Chair made in connection with the amendment of my colleague, Mr. MURDOCK, concerning the bridge transportation—that it did not follow necessarily that it would mean a reduction of expenditures that is only made in this amendment by the mere fact that this amendment seeks to take out of the mails a large amount of matter which is at the present time, under existing law, transported in the mail, and reduces the appropriation for that purpose.

Now, in that connection I call the attention of the Chair to precedent 3892, cited in Volume IV of Hinds' Precedents, with which I have no doubt the Chair is familiar. The amendment in that case was offered by Mr. Robinson, of Massachusetts, May 5, 1880, under the old Holman rule. It reads as follows:

Strike out all in the sixtieth and sixty-first and sixty-second lines between the word "namely," in the sixtieth line, and the word "Provided," in the sixty-second line, and substitute the following:

"For transportation on railroad routes, $9,490,000, of which sum $150,000 may be used by the Postmaster General to maintain and secure from railroads necessary and special facilities for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881."

Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, made a point of order against the amendment under Rule XXI as it then existed, in a modified form adopted at that session of Congress:

"Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill."

After debate the chairman said:

"Although the meaning of the words 'necessary' and 'special facilities for postal service' is not very clear, yet the Chair held yesterday, after giving the subject some consideration, that the effect of such an amendment would be to change existing law. The Chair still adheres to that opinion. But under the third clause of Rule XXI an individual Member upon the floor may offer an amendment changing existing law, provided it retrenches expenditures in one of three modes: First, by reducing the number and salaries of the officers of the United States, or, secondly, by reducing the compensation of persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or, thirdly, by reducing the amounts covered by the bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not propose to add an appropriation of $150,000 to the bill, but it provides that of the amount appropriated by the bill the sum of $150,000 may be used for certain purposes, and it diminishes the amount covered by the bill by striking out '$9,500,000' and inserting '$9,490,000.' So that the Chair is bound to hold that the amendment conforms strictly to the language of the rule. Whether the language actually used in this rule accomplishes the exact purpose which the House had in view in adopting it is not a question for the Chair to decide, but taking the language of the rule as it stands and putting upon it the construction which ordinarily would be put upon such language in a statute or in a rule of the House, the Chair is compelled to hold that the amendment comes within the rule, and is in order."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the language of this amendment complies exactly with the amendment offered under this precedent. In addition to that, it complies in every particular with the decision rendered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] on the Army appropriation bill at the last session, because the amendment, if it is carried out, must necessarily reduce the amount of mail matter carried over the railroads of the country.

Now, the point to the Saunders decision, as I understand it and as the Chair understands it, was that the Chair may look to existing law for the purpose of determining whether the amendment will retrench expenditures, and also whether it will reduce the amount of money paid out of the Treasury for compensation to any officers or persons.

Now, we all know that the amount of the compensation paid to railroads is fixed by law, subject to an examination or weighing of the mails by the Postmaster General, and that he may at any time weigh the mails and reduce the amount paid to the railroads. We also know that this will take out of the mails a great amount of matter that is now carried over the railroads of the country—a very large per cent of it.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to give an example of the class of mail that will be excluded by the enforcement of this amendment by the Postmaster General. I have here an example of that class of mail. I have here an editorial which I presume every Member of the House received in an envelope recently. It is an editorial of only a few lines, printed, it seems, very strange to say, right under that famous motto of the immortal Joseph Pulitzer, asking for fair play, arraigning corruption and tainted news, and demanding the independence of the press; and yet I will ask any gentleman of this House to look at this publication, marked as it is, and sent through the mails to every Member of this House, and answer under his conscience whether or not he believes that something outside of fair play inspired that editorial, and caused to be placed underneath the motto under which this famous paper is circulated through the mails of the United States and all over the world.

The heading of this editorial is "Lobbying for tyranny," and it proceeds to denounce bills like the Kenyon-Sheppard bill as bills for enforcing tyranny. Then it states that the Prohibitionists are wanting the Congress to enforce their laws for them.

Mr. Chairman, I denounce that statement as absolutely false. The Prohibitionists do not want this amendment, they do not want the Kenyon-Sheppard bill, or kindred bills, for the purpose of having the Federal Government enforce their laws for them, but they want such bills for the purpose of not having the Federal Government enforce upon them provisions of law which are absolutely incompatible with their own local police laws.

A statement was introduced into the RECORD the other day by a Senator, which advertised the fact that Uncle Sam was in partnership with the liquor interests of the country; a picture of Uncle Sam, and underneath it a statement that Uncle Sam is our partner, circulated through the mails of the United States all over the country by certain liquor houses, for the purpose of making it difficult for the States to enforce their local laws.

The purpose of this amendment is simply that the United States shall go out of partnership with the liquor interests of the country, that it shall withhold Government agency from the purpose of assisting these men to do in the States what the State law says its own citizens shall not do; and I say that the purpose of the amendment is not only right and just and consonant with good morals and the enforcement of the local laws of the States, but it is bound to reduce the expenditures of the Government. Why should the Government continue to pay out immense sums of money for the purpose of promoting the business of the liquor corporations and the business of the sellers of fake corporation stocks? I think any gentleman upon the floor of this House will agree with me that if that class of literature was stricken out of the mails of the United States, at least 10 per cent——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question before the House, and in violation of the rules of the House is discussing just what I thought he would, something else than the question before the committee.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman is making an argument to reenforce the proposition that he has laid down, that there will be a reduction in expenditures by this amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. He has not been talking about that for at least five minutes.

Mr. JACKSON. I assume that the gentleman from Tennessee will be bound by the ruling of the Chair, and I would like to state that in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of every Member of this House, if this amendment should be adopted striking from the mails of the United States the liquor advertisements and the liquor literature, and the promotion literature of the country put out for the purpose of swindling the innocent purchasers of corporation stock, much of which is already barred from the mails by fraud orders of the Post Office Department, and therefore strictly germane to that subject, the volume of mail carried by the country would be reduced at least 10 per cent. But, of course, the Chair is not concerned with the percentage. One per cent is just as good as 10 per cent for the legal question involved here. The Chair must see, in line with the opinion of Mr. Chairman Saunders, that this amendment will necessarily reduce the amount of mail carried over the railroads of the country, and if the Postmaster General complies with the law and with the direction of this amendment and weighs the mails, the amount paid out of the Treasury under this appropriation will be lessened, and in line with this precedent at section 3892 the reduction of the appropriation itself makes the entire amendment legal and proper at this time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the point of order?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am opposed to the point of order. I think the amendment is clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear from some one in favor of the point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word, perhaps using some of the latitude that the gentleman from Kansas took. Of course, I know the feeling of the Chair on this question and his sympathy, perhaps, with the motion of the gentleman, but I know that will not influence the action of the Chair. When I politely asked the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] what he meant by what he said, because I did not understand him, owing to the confusion and the distance that he was from me, he very promptly and very readily replied, with that commonplace and indecent stock repartee, that he was not responsible for my not having enough sense or ability to understand him. That is possibly true, Mr. Chairman. He may not be responsible for that. The argument made by the gentleman may be so intricate and so learned and so able that I can not understand it, but I hardly think so, in view of the judgment of the gentleman's constituents, who have recently repudiated him, and very meritoriously so, as unfit for service in this House. I want to say that, while the proposition to reduce the appropriation from $49,000,000 to $48,500,000 is in order, and while the proposition to make any reduction may be in order, yet when it is coupled with a proposal to establish a new law for the expenditure of the whole of the appropriation reduced from $49,000,000 to $48,500,000, the subject matter following the figures of the reduction being entirely new and there being no general law to support it or justify it, it is clearly out of order. The rule requires that no new matter shall be incorporated into an appropriation bill and that the appropriations shall be such only as are required to be made under general law. You can not by subterfuge and a pretended limitation of this character violate that rule of the House. Of course, everybody knows that the reduction proposed brings it within the section of the Holman rule, but are you to say that you can circumvent the purpose and intent of the law and the rule by adding after that reduction the imposition of new duties upon the department which possibly may cost even more than the $49,000,000? You have got no way to go into that question. You can not analyze it. You can not tell from the face of the proposition whether it is within or without the rule. It is left in doubt, in my judgment. I do not want to discuss the question fully, but I suggest that line of thought.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, the eloquent chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. MOON of Tennessee] has practically conceded in one part of his remarks that he is in error with regard to his point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I shall be glad to have the gentleman point out the place where I conceded that.

Mr. HOBSON. I will point it out to the gentleman. The gentleman remarked that the specific provision, by reducing the appropriation, was in order, but that the way in which it would be reduced was not in order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman has misunderstood me.

Mr. HOBSON. I will go a little further, and perhaps the gentleman will see it. He said that because it was a modification of the law it would be subject to the point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman is mixed.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman admits that if the first part of the amendment had not been in it it would have made no difference. The amendment does not have to make itself a provision for the reduction, provided that the carrying out of the amendment would clearly on the face of it result in a reduction. Furthermore, the gentleman as he was elaborating his position practically said that the new cost of the added duties of the Post Office Department would stand over against the saving which he thereby admitted would exist in the reduction of the deficit in carrying the second-class mail matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There was no admission of that kind made.

Mr. HOBSON. His very argument admitted it by saying that the added duties of the department might cost more than any alleged reduction. He thereby admitted that the amendment itself did produce a reduction. Now, then, I will submit it to any practical man that the expense in the duties of supervision to cut out matter could never be as great as the expense involved in the matter itself; that inspection is never as expensive as the work itself, and that the added cost of inspection would probably be nil, because the same authorities that are employed now would carry out the added inspection; that the reduced force in connection with the reduced volume would of itself of necessity be greater than any added force if there were any added force at all.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, it is plain on the face of it, and it is plainly inferable from the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the subject matter of this amendment, irrespective of its merits, would reduce the volume of the mails, and that part of the volume of the mails that is not self-sustaining, that part which entails a deficit, and therefore that the amendment would result in a reduction.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What particular class does the gentleman say there is a deficit in?

Mr. HOBSON. Particularly in the second-class mail matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman insist that the whole deficit is in the second-class matter?

Mr. HOBSON. No; but much of just such matter as is mailed into my district and into the district of the gentleman from Kansas, and into prohibition territory everywhere, is carried at a loss.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. So are newspapers and magazines.

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly; and if an amendment was offered to cut down the transportation of newspapers and magazines the amendment would be in order under the Holman rule. I do not believe that when this is understood it can be thrown out on a point of order. I do not believe that it was the original intention to discuss in all its phases the prohibition question, and I regret that my friend from Tennessee was impatient in his remarks at the outset.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say that I do not know what right the gentleman from Alabama has to say that I was impatient in my expression that there was a lot of rot to this question of prohibition. The gentleman ought to know that there is a lot of foolish stuff said about it, and he must know that there is more common rot and hypocrisy about this political issue than any other that I have known.

Mr. HOBSON. I would like to say on the question that every State has a right to its own local self-government; it has the right to exercise its own police powers; and that there is no subject under the Government that lies deeper toward the foundation of the Government.

The practice of the Federal Government in being a party to the violation of local law in this regard has no other analogue in the Government, has no parallel in history. The Federal Government to-day is a party to the violation of law in my district. It is a party to the violation of the law in the district and in the State of the gentleman who offered this amendment. When the Federal Government inculcates observance of law, in fact depends upon law, depends for its very perpetuity upon law and respect for law, it is certainly not consistent that an amendment asking that the Federal Government withdraw itself from partisanship in the violation of the law should be denied.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman really wants to present that issue and cover these questions and do something effectual in the interest of prohibition, does he think that he can get any advantage by the suggestion of a reduction of this item of $49,000,000? Does he think there is anything involved in it except the display of eloquence on the matter?

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to my friend that I have not been accustomed to make a display on the question here. When the proper time comes and the question is up on its merits, as I hope it will be some day and a day not far distant, I hope to have some remarks to make. I do not believe the object of display was the purpose of the gentleman from Kansas in offering the amendment. I do want to say that the question of saving the Government $100,000 in the Post Office appropriation bill, while it is worthy of consideration, nevertheless is not commensurate with the importance of the greater question as to whether in the operation of this bill, or any other bill now and at any other time and at all times, the Federal Government should withdraw wherever it can legitimately do it from abetting, aiding, and becoming an outlaw under the police power and legitimate laws of States and of districts and of counties.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. On the point of order I understood the gentleman to say that the proviso in the amendment would be in order under the Holman rule on the ground that it would reduce the amount expended by the Government by cutting out a portion of second-class matter which is not self-sustaining. If that amendment should prevail, would it not become necessary for the postal officials to examine all second-class mail matter covered by it?

Mr. HOBSON. I do not think so. I think it would be simply sufficient for the postmasters at the points where this mail matter now comes into the mail to simply examine it. I do not believe that it would require a single new official under the Government.

Mr. MANN. I am not saying whether it would require any new official or not, but would it not require an examination by some postal official of every piece of second-class mail matter deposited in the mails?

Mr. HOBSON. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. How, then, would it become effective?

Mr. HOBSON. I think each postmaster where the mail matter was put in would be able to tell at once with reasonable certainty, and if finally he found he was not catching it he would later be able to tell at once in the ordinary exercise of his duties whether it was illegal or not.

Mr. MANN. Could he tell without any examination of the second-class mail matter?

Mr. HOBSON. I do not mean to maintain, as the gentleman must so understand, that it would require no examination to enforce the law, but I do mean to say that if there was any possible increase in the cost due to excluding it from the mail it would not be commensurate with and could not be commensurate with the saving to the Government in the body of the matter itself.

Mr. MANN. Would it not, as a matter of fact, be sure to require quite a corps of officials in the Post Office Department in cities like New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago to examine and read through all of the second-class mail matter offered for deposit in order to see whether either the advertising or the reading matter contravened the provisions of the law?

Mr. HOBSON. Under the supposition of the gentleman today every official in the Post Office Department would be reading all of the second-class mail matter to see if the anti-lottery law was being enforced.

Mr. MANN. But there is a special provision against putting lottery matter in the mail, which of itself enforces that law to a certain extent—it does not enforce it completely; but here is a provision affecting inland transportation, and it seems to me that it would require the examination by some one—I do not mean to say of every piece of second-class mail matter, but of each issue of all second-class mail matter which was published.

Mr. HOBSON. I think it would require and would involve the scrutiny of mail matter sent out by these particular interests at their particular localities, but on the face of it it is a plain question, and any possible, slight, incidental increase in cost could not possibly be commensurate with the saving in cost from the bulk of the matter which is excluded.

Mr. MANN. Is not that a pure matter of argument?

Mr. HOBSON. No; it is self-evident. I think the question raised by the gentleman is a pure matter of argument.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman assumes it is self-evident, when no one in the world can tell. It is a pure guess at that. On one side you say there is a saving and on the other side there is an admitted expense. No one on earth can tell in advance which side will be the heaviest.

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to the gentleman that the matter of additional expense is questionable, but the matter of saving is material and is self-evident. It is borne on the face of the amendment itself.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In connection with the colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the postal laws now provide against the mailing of lewd and lascivious publications and pamphlets, and certain mechanical devices, certain things dangerous to the mail, certain instrumentalities for the prevention of conception. Divers and sundry other items are positively excluded from the mail.

Mr. MANN. They are all in the criminal code.

Mr. RODDENBERY. They are prohibited and made penal under the existing law. If this proviso goes in, it not only provides for the exclusion of this matter and on its face reduces the amount of money covered by the bill, but in addition to that, in the very language of the proviso, it appears that there is excluded from the mails a large volume of matter; and the Chair will take cognizance of the fact that the cost to the Government is based on what is transported measured in weight by pounds.

The question of the cost to the Government of the enforcement of this provision as a set-off against the amount carried in the bill, as a parliamentary question, can not possibly be involved. Besides, under this provision, in consideration of and in conjunction with the general law, it not only becomes prohibited in an appropriation bill, but it becomes a crime to transport it, because by law it is declared unmailable matter, and the same employees, agents, and instrumentalities of the Government that enforce the provisions of existing laws not covered in this particular law will be adequate entirely for inspection, detection, and enforcement of this amendment if enacted. I would also suggest further to the gentleman that if the part of the amendment conceded to be in order by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] were not in the amendment, that the proviso itself in its very terms, without any presumption, shows a reduction in the amount covered by the bill. It is indisputable. It in no way comes under the provision of the rule relating to amendments reported from a committee having jurisdiction, and therefore, if the English language means anything and if common intelligence can be applied to that language, there can be but one deduction, and that is that it will reduce the necessary expenses of the Government in transporting mail on a weight basis. The amendment, however, provides in terms for the reduction of the appropriation by half a million dollars.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman. I think he is clearly right, that the officials of the Post Office Department now are constantly looking through the mail to see whether any part of it is illegal. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] only makes the suggestion that the difference would be that we do not carry any penalty for this violation, but, as the gentleman from Georgia just pointed out, that is not necessary when you make a general law on an appropriation bill. Any part of all the provisions of this bill when enacted into law would have the whole force of the Government for its enforcement.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman bases his argument upon the fact that the volume of second-class mail will be reduced and that there is a loss on second-class mail, and therefore the result would be a saving.

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; and the volume would be less, and, of course, the Government would not pay on that.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to call attention to the fact that this amendment excludes first-class mail.

Mr. HOBSON. Somewhat.

Mr. STEENERSON. And that upon first-class mail there is a very large profit, so that by reducing the volume of first-class mail you will entail a loss.

Mr. HOBSON. I will answer the gentleman in his own kind, I think, by telling him that the general prosperity of the Nation resulting from a better enforcement of law, that reduces the amount of toxin that is a specific for degeneracy—and I assume the gentleman knows that——

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not know anything about that; but I do know that there is a profit on first-class mail.

Mr. HOBSON. That this particular toxin is a specific for degeneracy.

The general increase of intelligence and prosperity of the people, resulting from the reduced consumption of the specific in degeneracy, would far more than make up for any supposititious loss from reducing first-class mail matter, and would, in fact, increase the volume of all business, and consequently the volume of first-class mail matter.

Mr. STEENERSON. My suggestion is if on its face it does not involve a loss to the first-class mail matter on which there is a profit?

Mr. HOBSON. It does not on the matter that comes into my district. I shall be perfectly willing to see a modification that would cut it out of the first class.

Mr. STEENERSON. That might save your amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. I think it is supposititious. I do not think that the amendment needs saving.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad, whichever way this matter is to be decided, that it should be done.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a suggestion to the Chair if not sufficient time has been had in order for the Chair to rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to know if anyone desires to be heard against the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard. As I understand the rule, Mr. Chairman, if any part of an amendment is subject to a point of order the amendment fails. That is to say, the first two lines are clearly in order, but in my judgment the balance is clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he understands that is true where a proposition is submitted under the Holman rule?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think so. Otherwise you could put the whole criminal or civil code, or all legislation, into an amendment that could be tortured into being germane. But I will also make a point of order in addition to one that was made on the proviso. Now, what is this? Does it appear upon this proviso that it would retrench expenditures? Not at all. That is purely a matter of argument.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. The way I read this precedent, it holds exactly to the contrary of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said.

Mr. CANNON. What is the precedent? When was the decision made?

Mr. JACKSON. This was a decision made May 5, 1880, under the old Holman rule. The Chairman was Mr. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky. He said:

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not propose to add an appropriation of $150,000 to the bill, but it provides that of the amount appropriated by the bill the sum of $150,000 may be used for certain purposes, and it diminishes the amount covered by the bill by striking out "$9,500,000" and inserting "$9,490,000." So that the Chair is bound to hold that the amendment conforms strictly to the language of the rule.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman the amendment there?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes; I will read that to the gentleman. It says:

For transportation on railroad routes, $9,490,000, of which sum $150,000 may be used by the Postmaster General to maintain and secure from railroads necessary and special facilities for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.

The latter part of the amendment following the reduction in the appropriation bill mentioned in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. I recollect the precedent that the gentleman speaks of, and, although the decision was made by so famous a parliamentarian as ex-Speaker Carlisle, it seems to me it was not well made. I recollect when it was made. However, let that be as it may, this proviso and this amendment are not upon all fours with that precedent. This amendment provides:

That no part of such appropriation shall be used in transporting mail matter consisting in any part of any letter, circular, packet, newspaper, magazine, or other periodical, advertising for sale either directly or indirectly any spirituous, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors for transportation to or delivery in any State, county, municipality wherein the sale of such liquor is or may be hereafter prohibited by State law or when like pieces of mail matter are intended to promote the sale of stock, shares, or bonds, or other forms of indebtedness of any corporation, company, or association unless the same have first been inspected and approved by the Postmaster General as free from intended fraud upon purchasers and proper to be introduced into the mails of the United States, and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation for the purpose of weighing the mails and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid to railway companies for transporting the mails by excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States.

I do not suppose that the chairman of the committee can take notice that any newspaper carries an advertisement or any of the advertisements referred to or that any letter is written. And while it is true that it strikes off $500,000 from the appropriation, it adds $100,000 in directing a reweighing of the mails.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman misunderstands.

Mr. CANNON. It says:

Is hereby authorized and directed.

That is legislation to do what? To use $100,000 for the purpose of weighing the mails and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid to railway companies for transporting the mails. That is not all:

By excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States.

Now, it seems to me that the proviso is subject to a point of order. If it is, it seems to me that the whole amendment goes out. But if it does not, the point of order has also been made upon the proviso. If this can be done, then the Holman rule and the rule that prohibits legislation upon appropriation bills is nullified, and you can put under the guise of an amendment a revision of the laws of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit the Chair a question right there?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very anxious to determine this question in accordance with the spirit of the rules of the House. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman this idea, which is in the Chairman's mind: It seems to be conceded that the first sentence there, involving a reduction of $500,000, is in order.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now query: If there be connected with that proposition, which is in order, a proposition that is directly related to it, as this rather appears to be, pointing out the way apparently in which that reduction can be brought about, does it not seem to come within the Holman rule, particularly when considered in the light of the precedents laid down by Mr. Speaker Carlisle, although the Chair believes the gentleman from Illinois has taken issue with that decision?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think that decision does not cover this amendment. I think if this would be in order it would be in order to amend the amendment, making a rate of 5 cents a pound or 2 cents a pound for the transportation of newspapers and magazines. I think, as I said before, that you could put a whole code on the bill. It would be in order, it seems to me, to amend so as to exclude all matter that would, by argument, reduce expenditures.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. Can the Chair determine from this amendment whether there are any newspapers circulated or letters written? The Chair must construe that, and the amendment must speak for itself. The Chair must be able to say that from the proviso upon its face without argument there would be a reduction of expenditures.

Now, I should argue the other side of the question that the $100,000 with which the Postmaster General is arbitrarily clothed would be an increase.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean that the Chair must have actual or judicial knowledge of it?

Mr. CANNON. It must appear on the face of the proviso.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. CANNON. On the proviso. That is what I claim.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the Postmaster General under this amendment be required to open letters to ascertain whether or not they contained anything in violation of the prohibition laws of the various States? Would he have authority to do it?

Mr. CANNON. I do not care to discuss it. The mere asking of the question shows how far we could go if this amendment be in order and germane.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. We do now have machinery and officials under the direction of the Post Office Department to do the very thing that the gentleman mentions—to open letters and examine mail for the purpose of seeing whether the law is being violated, do we not?

Mr. CANNON. I am not aware of it. If there be any law authorizing the Postmaster General or his subordinates to open a letter with a 2-cent stamp on it, I am not aware of it.

Mr. JACKSON. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that the Attorney General seized a lot of mail in the city of New York recently?

Mr. CANNON. Well, there are people who might say that the Attorney General has, perchance, violated the law. I know of no law that authorizes the breaking of the seal of a letter being in the United States mails.

Mr. JACKSON. Does the gentleman understand me? If the Post Office Department issues an order—and it certainly has that right—does the gentleman deny the authority of that department or the authority of the Department of Justice to open a letter for the purpose of ascertaining that fact?

Mr. CANNON. I do absolutely deny it.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman should inform the President, then.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to say this, in response to the suggestion of the Chairman: The proposed amendment is not really one amendment; it is three amendments. Now, if it be in order, you are met with this situation, that by the reduction of the amount appropriated in any particular item, by a fraction of a cent, and then by adding to that any language relating to the subject matter with which the paragraph deals—and I make a distinction relating to the subject matter, but not to the economy in dealing with the subject matter—it becomes in order because, according to the contention of the gentleman, they have made an economical proposal by simply reducing the amount appropriated. Now, I contend that this must be true: Any legislation that is attached to an amendment which reduces the amount, in order to be in order must on its face, not as a matter of conclusion, not as a matter of argument or deduction, but absolutely because of the language used, show that it will bring about a reduction in expenditure.

Now, if a proviso had been put in, not only reducing the amount but saying also that there shall be a less sum paid—as, for instance, 60 per cent of the pay heretofore paid per pound—it would be manifest that such an amendment would on its face show that it went in the direction of economy. But when you undertake to argue from the broad statement of an exclusion of a particular kind of mail matter, which of itself requires, in order to be excluded, a great deal of work and search, that that will bring about a reduction, you are simply arguing a conclusion in which one man's judgment is as good as another's. I might, for example, take the suggestion inferentially made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] and say that seemingly, in accordance with his prohibition view, it is going to improve the health of the people and to increase their wealth and happiness to exclude from the mails the matter referred to, and therefore there will result, instead of a reduction, an additional expenditure, due to additional quantities of mail resulting from greater industry and prosperity, the Nation having gotten rid of the blight of intoxicants. If the Chair holds this in order, it follows that any man can make in order on any paragraph anything relating to that paragraph by the very easy device of providing a reduction of half a cent in the amount appropriated.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Would it be in order to demand a division of that amendment at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, except upon a vote. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] made his point of order merely to the proviso.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The reason I ask the question is this: It is clear that the argument that this amendment is not obnoxious to the point of order rests on the fact that on its face it makes a reduction in the amount carried by the bill. If it merely provided for a retrenchment, it would be in order only when presented by a committee, not by an individual. If the question is divided, the legislative proposition is at once divorced from the reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman understand that the rules of the House will permit the division of a question before a ruling by the Chair?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am uncertain as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks otherwise.

Mr. SHERLEY. There may not be a division in the sense in which you have a division when a vote is had; but I submit to the Chair that in considering whether a matter is really germane and not subject to a point of order that very question must arise, because otherwise all I have to do is to insert the word "and" after the clause proposing the reduction and then continue indefinitely any sort of legislation that relates to that particular matter.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I know the Chair has before him the star-route case. As he will observe, an attempt was made, under the Holman rule, to reduce an appropriation by $500 and couple with this reduction a legislative proposition with regard to the method of making star-route contracts, or something of the kind. It seems to me that this is a parallel case. I remember that the parliamentarian who preceded Mr. HINDS, a gentleman named Crutchfield, in his book made the comment that the same result could have been arrived at by demanding a division of the question. This comment appears, I think, in the Manual of the Fifty-third Congress. That is why I ask whether the present moment would be an appropriate time to demand a division of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says the same result could have been arrived at. What result?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The result of projecting the point of order on the legislation and not on the reduction. In the star-route case the Chair sustained the point of order as against the legislative provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is familiar with the star-route ruling to which he has called the attention of the Chair. That proposed to refund $500, I believe, in the amount carried by the bill, and then proposed a contract system for the star routes; but there really was not any effort to show any connection, was there, between the contract system proposed and the reduction of $500?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. There has been scarcely more than a pro forma attempt here.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question, of course.

Mr. HOBSON. The Chair had not finished his statement. We would like to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked a question of the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the Chair's question without interrupting?

Mr. HOBSON. I wonder if the gentleman from Massachusetts would condescend to allow the Chairman to finish a simple statement?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. After the gentleman has been recognized——

Mr. HOBSON. I assumed, of course, that when the glorious gentleman from Massachusetts spoke to me, I was recognized by every rule in the world.

Mr. MANN. How good natured they all are. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts has now forgotten the question asked by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The suggestion of the Chair was this: In the star-route case, to which the gentleman kindly called the attention of the Chair, there does not seem to have been any effort to connect the reduction with the proposed legislation, whereas in the mind of the Chair there does seem to be in this amendment some connection between the legislation and the proposed reduction.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit me, I said that that is just the point to be determined. When there is simply a suggestion it does not come within the rule. It must absolutely appear upon the face of it that it will result in a reduction in order to come within the rule; and whenever it requires a suggestion, whenever it requires an argument, whenever the Chair's mind must go out exploring in order to come to a conclusion as to whether it does or does not result in a reduction, that moment, by the very process that the Chair has to undertake, he should determine that it does not in a parliamentary sense show a reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. Assuming that matter of the kind described passes through the mail—and frankly the Chair thinks he must take cognizance of that fact—the elimination of that matter from the mail would reduce the weight of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the weight is not the only thing that determines the expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Weight is the only thing that determines the expense, so far as this particular item is concerned, is it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps; but that is not the proposition that is before the Chair. It does not simply say that it must reduce expenses in this particular way, but that it must reduce expenses. The rule does not qualify it to the extent that the Chair undertakes to qualify it.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. Has the gentleman read the amendment carefully?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have read it several times.

Mr. JACKSON. I was going to suggest that the gentleman's last statement indicated that he misunderstood the latter part of it. The amendment does direct the way in which the reduction shall be made—that it shall be made by excluding from the mails these pieces of mail matter which are carried at the present time.

Now, if I understand Judge SAUNDERS's opinion, it says that the Chair must look at the law to determine whether the result will be a retrenchment of expenses. The cases are very similar, Mr. Chairman. When the Army bill was before the House, the number of regiments was reduced from 15 to 10. Judge SAUNDERS said that that must necessarily result in a reduction of expenses.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that by the very language of his amendment he excludes letters that contain matter relating to alcoholic liquors, letters that go by first-class mail. It is a matter of knowledge, it is a matter of proof, that the first-class mail is the profitable mail of the country—the mail that practically sustains the Government in its large losses from other mail matter. Can the gentleman say by virtue of his amendment that the exclusion of first-class mail matter, of postage that carries such mail matter, will result in an economy to the Government?

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky is a good one, and I am glad he made it, as I wanted an opportunity to say something on that subject. The gentleman says that the Chair must take knowledge of the fact that some of this matter goes by letter.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I did not say that.

Mr. JACKSON. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. I said that the gentleman's amendment expressly related to letters which are carried in the first-class mail.

Mr. JACKSON. And the gentleman further stated that the Chair must take knowledge of the fact that the first-class mail is a profitable mail.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not say that.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman will wait until I conclude——

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman is talking in my time, and he must not misrepresent me.

Mr. JACKSON. I think that the gentleman will acknowledge that I do not misrepresent him if he will wait. The gentleman said that the Chair must consider the fact, or take knowledge of the fact, that the first-class mail is the profitable mail.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I do not think I said that.

Mr. JACKSON. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can give the gentleman the information, but I can not furnish him the understanding.

Mr. JACKSON. Now, I have been castigated for using that expression, and I hope the gentleman will not incur the displeasure of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps the difference is in the application of it.

Mr. JACKSON. I say that if it is the duty of the Chair to recognize that the first-class mail is a profitable mail, it is also his duty to recognize that second and third class mail is unprofitable, and the hearings on this very bill show that the entire second-class matter was carried last year at a deficit. So it must necessarily follow that any reduction in the amount of mail will result in a retrenchment of expenditures.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to say to the Chair that I did not say, and do not now say, that the Chair can take judicial knowledge of the fact that first-class mail matter is profitable or unprofitable. I said it might be well argued inasmuch as the amendment of the gentleman related to first-class mail matter, that therefore since it was a matter of common knowledge that there would be a loss of revenue since you were lessening the class of mail that brought in a profitable revenue.

But, Mr. Chairman, all of this is for the purpose of showing that the whole matter is one of argument. The gentleman's speech, my speech, the speeches here, the very need for constant reiteration of information, shows that it is a matter of information and that the language itself is not so plain as to be within the meaning of the rule and show that there must be a reduction by virtue of its adoption. That is the meat of the whole thing, and the very fact that the Chair has to go out and weigh and balance the proof shows that it does not come within the rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, in response to the last suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will say that the mere fact that the Chair has to weigh and balance the merits of the amendment submitted does not show that the point of order is well taken. On the contrary it is perfectly proper for the Chair before passing on a point of order to an amendment, claimed to be within the Holman rule, to balance the pros and cons of the proposition on its merits. If he is satisfied on the whole, that the necessary effect of the amendment, operating by its own force, will be a retrenchment of expenditures in one of the three ways contemplated by the rule, then the point of order should be overruled.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not just now. I wish to present in their sequence some thoughts which I have in mind. It is not necessary on behalf of an amendment of this character to establish with the inexorable severity of a mathematical demonstration that it will effect retrenchment of expenditures. Nor is the Chair confined to consideration of the face of the amendment, or of the paragraph, or compelled to determine from the same without extraneous aid, or assistance, whether it will effect a retrenchment.

Mr. Speaker Kerr expressly ruled, and this ruling has been uniformly followed, that in determining whether an amendment will effect retrenchment, the Chair can look to the pending bill, the specific section, or amendment under consideration, the law of the land, so far as applicable, and the parliamentary rules and practices of the House. Keeping these aids to a conclusion in mind, the Chair must determine whether the amendment under consideration will operate of its own force to reduce expenditures. The mere fact that the Chair may think that it is likely that an amendment may operate to effect retrenchment, is not sufficient ground on which to hold that such amendment is in order. There must be something more. To be in order, the amendment must necessarily bring about such a result, ex proprio vigore. But the determination on this point must be reached by the Chair. If he is reasonably satisfied that such a result will follow, this conclusion of his own mind will fix his ruling, and sustain the amendment. It is insisted in this debate, that if the conclusion of retrenchment, from the operation of an amendment, is a matter of debate, or argument, then it does not appear from the amendment itself that it will effect retrenchment, and therefore the same will be out of order. This contention is not sound. Any proposition may be the subject of debate. Conceding that the Chair is limited to an inspection of the face of the amendment, even then the proper conclusion to be drawn therefrom, may be contested, and appropriately debated. The opponents of the amendment may contend with vehemence that no rule of economy will attend its operation, while with equal vehemence and superior logic the friends of the amendment may demonstrate that from its operation such a result will be a reasonably necessary sequence. Hence, the mere fact that the effect of a proposition may be assailed in debate, will not operate to establish its invalidity, or put it beyond the pale of the Holman rule. The true doctrine is, that before sustaining an amendment offered under the Holman rule, the Chair must be reasonably satisfied, whether with or without debate, that such amendment operating by its own force will effect a retrenchment of expenditures. If the processes of his own mind bring him to this conclusion, after the consideration of all the matter proper to be considered under Speaker Kerr's ruling, then the point of order should be overruled. The Holman rule should be viewed in the light of reason, and of what it is designed to accomplish.

I agree that if the Chair is in doubt, if he can not reasonably determine whether retrenchment will follow the amendment, if with all the light before him he is unable to concur in the view urged by the friends of the pending proposition that it is one of necessary economy, then the point of order should be sustained; but if the Chair upon a reasonable view of the situation—because we are all supposedly reasonable beings, doing the best that we can with our problems, and applying the rule of reason to the solution of our difficulties—if, I say, the Chair upon full consideration of the subject matter reaches the conclusion that a reduction of expenditures will be effected with reasonable certainty by the amendment, then such an amendment, I submit, will be in order. The Chair is entitled to look to the legislative features of the amendment designed to effect economies, and to the reduction of $500,000 in the total amount appropriated, which is a part of the amendment and is presented as a result of the legislation in the proposed provision. He is also entitled to consider whatever is presented by the experience of the department as actual results in the handling of material of this character. If upon the whole, the Chair reasonably concludes, having in mind the known cost of transporting this class of matter, the provisions of the amendment, and the change in the total appropriation, that a reduction of expenditures will follow the enactment of this amendment, then upon such a view the amendment is in order, whatever the Chair may think of its merits, or the propriety of its passage.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just a few words in somewhat of a personal way.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman has already spoken about three times, as often as any other gentleman has spoken upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The present occupant of the chair has been in the chair on different occasions when different phases of this Holman rule have been construed, and the Chair thinks that the reading of such decisions as he has already made upon those matters will indicate the tendency of the present occupant of the chair to always construe that rule strictly and not to give it wider latitude than the clear import of the language used in it justifies. The Chair is disposed to apply that same principle in the decision that he is now called upon to make.

"Provided, That no part of such appropriation shall be used in transporting mail matter consisting in any part of any letter, circular, packet, newspaper, magazine, or other periodical advertising for sale, either directly or indirectly, any spirituous, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors, for transmission to or delivery in any State, county, municipality, wherein the sale of such liquors is or may be hereafter prohibited by State law, or when like pieces of mail matter are intended to promote the sale of stocks, shares, bonds, or other forms of indebtedness of any corporation, company, or association, unless the same have first been inspected and approved by the Postmaster General as free from intended fraud upon purchasers and proper to be introduced into the mails of the United States; and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation for the purpose of weighing the mails and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid the railway companies for transporting the mails by excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States."

It is conceded that the first part of the amendment is in order under the Holman rule, as it carries a reduction of $500,000 in the appropriation. It is the opinion of the Chair that where a proposition of legislation follows a proposition to reduce the amount and is so related to that proposition to reduce the amount as to be clearly and logically germane thereto, it is brought within the operation of the rule.

The decision referred to has been read, but the order was not altogether good at the time, and the Chair will ask the indulgence of the House while he reads it again:

On May 5, 1880, the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when Mr. George D. Robinson, of Massachusetts, offered this amendment to the paragraph providing $9,500,000 for transportation of mails on railroad routes:

"Strike out all in the sixtieth and sixty-first and sixty-second lines between the word 'namely,' in the sixtieth line, and the word 'Provided,' in the sixty-second line, and substitute the following:

"'For transportation on railroad routes, $9,490,000, of which sum $150,000 may be used by the Postmaster General to maintain and secure from railroads necessary and special facilities for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.'"

Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, made a point of order against the amendment, under Rule XXI, as it then existed, in a modified form adopted at that session of Congress:

"Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill."

The Chair will state that the form was the same as it is now, except that it did not then contain the proviso, or at least the proviso was not invoked in that discussion.

After debate, the Chairman, Mr. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, overruled the point of order in the following language:

Although the meaning of the words "necessary and special facilities for postal service" is not very clear, yet the Chair held yesterday, after giving the subject some consideration, that the effect of such an amendment would be to change existing law. The Chair still adheres to that opinion. But under the third clause of Rule XXI an individual Member upon the floor may offer an amendment changing existing law provided it retrenches expenditures in one of three modes: First, by reducing the number and salaries of the officers of the United States; or, second, by reducing the compensation of persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States; or, third, by reducing the amounts covered by the bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not propose to add an appropriation of $150,000 to the bill; but it provides that of the amount appropriated by the bill the sum of $150,000 may be used for certain purposes, and it diminishes the amount covered by the bill by striking out "$9,500,000" and inserting "$9,490,000." So that the Chair is bound to hold that the amendment conforms strictly to the language of the rule. Whether the language actually used in this rule accomplishes the exact purpose which the House had in view in adopting it is not a question for the Chair to decide; but taking the language of the rule as it stands and putting upon it the construction which ordinarily would be put upon such language in a statute or in a rule of the House, the Chair is compelled to hold that the amendment comes within the rule, and is in order.

We have here one more proposition than was contained in the proposition on which Mr. Carlisle then had occasion to rule. That contained a proposition to reduce the amount, a proposition to authorize $150,000 for a certain purpose. The proposition presented by the gentleman from Kansas seeks to reduce the amount, and then it proposes to have certain governmental activities, or to lay certain limitations that upon the face of it would appear to the Chair to make it possible to make some reduction of amount at least, and then another proposition similar to that which was contained in the amendment ruled upon by Mr. Carlisle.

It seems to the Chair that the proviso against which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes the point of order is so related to that portion of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas, which is admitted to be in order, that it is germane, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division of the amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 21, page 17, by striking out "$49,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a substantive proposition, and I insist that that as a single amendment shall be put to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to offer an amendment to that portion of the amendment which I just read?

Mr. STEENERSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment just read by the Clerk.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JACKSON) there were—ayes 20, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the balance of this proposition is not now in order in view of the vote of the committee.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that an amendment is not in order pending the point of order of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. HAUGEN. I understood that the matter had been disposed of.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have an amendment which, as soon as it is in order, I want to offer.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas will state it.

Mr. JACKSON. I want to inquire of the Chairman if we are going to be permitted to discuss this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has made the point of order upon the second part of the gentleman's amendment. The Clerk had not reported that part of the amendment. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has demanded a division. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] permit the Clerk to report what would be the second amendment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

"Provided, That no part of such appropriation shall be used in transporting mail matter consisting in any part of any letter, circular, packet, newspaper, magazine, or other periodical advertising for sale, either directly or indirectly, any spirituous, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors for transmission to or delivery in any State, county, or municipality wherein the sale of such liquors is or may be hereafter prohibited by State law or when like pieces of mail matter are intended to promote the sale of stocks, shares, bonds, or other forms of indebtedness of any corporation, company, or association, unless the same have first been inspected and approved by the Postmaster General as free from intended fraud upon purchasers and proper to be introduced into the mails of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. And to that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes a point of order.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will indulge me, I should like to be heard in opposition to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] courteously yielded to me, the proviso in itself shows a retrenchment of expenditures, and it is in conformity with the ruling of the Chair already announced. The ruling of Mr. Speaker Carlisle was based on the proposition of reducing the amount carried in the bill, and under the additional proviso that the Postmaster General might exercise certain powers in availing himself of $150,000 of the appropriation. Now, the pending amendment or proviso goes still further. It meets both the conditions of the ruling of Mr. Speaker Carlisle, and, in addition to that, it shows on its face that there will be denied and excluded from the carrying in the mails a very large volume of matter which is at present carried. The Chair undoubtedly will take cognizance that such elimination from the mails will lessen the cost to the Government.

The Chair will no doubt take further cognizance that the matter sought to be prohibited involves many tons of mail. Then this proviso, if adopted and enforced, will have a result that can not but be apparent to the Chair. The Chair of course will assume, as he must assume, that the provisions of the law will be executed, hence the result is that there will be excluded from railway mail transportation a weighty volume of expensive and chargeable matter. If this be correct, it is not necessary that there be any provision reducing the actual amount in dollars. It is not assumed that the Government will pay any more of the appropriation than is necessary to execute the enactment of Congress upon the subject. And it is the law that the mails are transported by weight charges paid by the Government to the carriers, for which this appropriation is made. It must also be conceded that when this appropriation is passed it is not known, as a matter of law or fact, what the weights of the mail will be, nor, therefore, what the charge in dollars for transportation will be. Then, if the proviso shows on its face that the quantity of matter carried by the mails would be reduced, this appropriation, based upon weight, will be likewise reduced. It is a matter of unescapable logic and deduction that there will be a reduction of expenses and retrenchment. If there be no retrenchment under this proviso, it must be because the administrative department provided for in the law and included in the proviso pays a rate in excess of law or pays for matter that is not carried. Such would be an unwarranted, if not impossible, assumption. And I submit, Mr. Chairman, as stated heretofore, that the proviso itself conforms to the literal terms of the Holman rule. It is germane, as the Chair has ruled, and it did not require the $500,000 reduction amendment to make it germane. Hence, voting down the first division of the amendment does not alter that part. It has in it the element of reducing the cost to the Government, and it does not take an amendment reducing in dollars the amount carried by the bill for that to be made to appear. Hence, voting down the first division of the amendment does not take the proviso out of the Holman rule. If this be true, the proviso would seem to be not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] permit the Chair to ask a question? The Chair has ruled upon this proposition, standing as a whole, and then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] demanded a division of the question, that division being demanded for the purpose of having a division on the vote. It was conceded, as the Chair understood, by the gentleman from Kentucky that a division could not be made prior to the ruling of the Chair for the purpose of having a ruling upon each matter separately. Now, query: Can you do by indirection that which can not be done by direction?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. This is not a question of that sort. The whole basis for the amendment rests upon the fact that there is to be a reduction in the expense to the Government and to establish the fact that they purpose in the amendment to reduce it from $49,000,000 to $48,500,000. The Chair has held that under the Holman rule that is a basis for the ruling in favor of the point of order, both the proviso and the amount. Now, the House has declined to make any reduction in the amount. The question comes in, Does the proviso stand alone; the House having sustained the amount of $49,000,000 and not agreed to the other amount? Does the amendment alone, standing upon its face, force the Chair to the conclusion that a reduction will still be maintained under the Holman rule?

Now, I do not want to discuss this question seriously very long. Everybody knows that if this amendment were carried and became a law you would have to open up every package of letters in every place in the United States, and it would take more men to attend to that work than it takes to carry the mail. Without being offensive to anybody, or intending to be, it seems that any man removed three degrees from idiocy would know that it would cost this Government four or five millions of dollars to carry out this amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the point of order that the question itself has already been passed upon by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] makes the point of order that the question has already been ruled upon by the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Chair and of the committee to the ruling made in the Fifty-second Congress, in which the Chairman himself decided this same question, as noted on page 409 of the Manual.

The CHAIRMAN. The old one or the new one?

Mr. HARDWICK. The new one, the second session Manual.

The CHAIRMAN. What rule is it under?

Mr. HARDWICK. It was under the Holman rule. I read:

An amendment was proposed reducing by one the number of clerks in a bureau provided for in the bill, coupled with a distinct provision repealing part of an act, the effect of which repeal would dispense with the one clerk in such bureau. Held that so much of the amendment as provided for the repeal was subject to the point of order, its effect not being directly to reduce expenditure.

In other words, in that case, if the Chair will get the Precedents and look it up he will find, I think, that this happened: That it was held that part of the amendment which reduced in so many figures the total of the appropriation carried in the bill was in order, but that another part of the amendment was not in order, the question being separated and the Chair holding one part as in order and the other part not in order that sought indirectly to carry out that purpose. He held that that part was not in order. It appears to me here that the second part of the amendment is subject to the point of order under the Holman rule, and that the question is susceptible of a division. That same thing was done in the case I cite.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] that the Chair having passed upon the matter as a whole, and not having divided the subject, it is still in order when a division is demanded for the purpose of voting?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly the Chair could pass on it separately.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, if the second part of the paragraph had been out of order, the Chair would have ruled the whole as being out of order, and the Chair having ruled the whole as in order, one part could not be out of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I thought when the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] that under the Holman rule it was in order. The Chair held it to be in order. Thereupon the committee amended the amendment. But the amendment having been held to be in order, and an amendment to that amendment having been agreed to, I do not see how it is possible to declare a portion of the original amendment out of order so long as a change has been made by the committee by way of amendment.

If the original amendment was in order when it was offered, it certainly still is in order when presented to the House to vote upon it. The very fact that the committee has amended the amendment would ordinarily preclude the making of a point of order against the amendment, because after an amendment is offered to the amendment, which in the first place was subject to a point of order, it is too late to raise the point of order. But the amendment having been held to be in order, as proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], I do not see how an amendment agreed to by the committee to that amendment will thereby render it out of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair please, it was the right, and the Chair so held, of anyone to demand a division. A division is granted because there are distinct propositions. In this case there were three propositions. Now, those three propositions were considered by the Chair on a former point of order, and in weighing any one of the three the Chair weighed it in connection with the other two, and the decision of the Chair expressly showed that. But when it came to voting, a Member in the exercise of his right demanded a division, which was granted, so that now there come before the House three distinct propositions, because that is the meaning of the division itself. One of those propositions has been voted down. With its voting down there falls the support from which the second proposition got its right to appear at all, and therefore the condition being now as if the first proposition had never been, because legislatively it does not exist, it is no part of the bill under discussion. The Chair has confronting it a proposition—the second proposition here—and on that the point of order is made, because there is nothing to predicate the contention on.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is nothing on which to predicate the contention that it necessarily brings about a reduction in expenditure. And in that connection I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the rule. The rule provides that a reduction of expenditure generally holds only where an amendment is offered by authority of the committee, but where the amendment is offered by an individual the reduction must be in the amount carried in the bill.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Kentucky yields to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] the Chair will say that he had in mind a matter which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has just suggested and meant to propound that inquiry later on; but the matter which is in the mind of the Chair just now is, having ruled upon this proposition as a whole, and as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expressed it, the Committee of the Whole having amended that amendment that was proposed, that is virtually amending it by failing to adopt a portion of it, whether the Committee of the Whole should not vote on the other part of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit, in thinking over the matter I think the only trouble was in holding that the matter was not divisible as a subject for the point of order. I submit that the only reason for a division is because more than one substantive provision is proposed. That is the only ground on which you can have a division. Therefore, we have not amended the amendment. We have refused to agree to one of three amendments and we now have before the House two amendments. I maintain that the second of those three, that is, the first of the remaining two, has nothing on which to rest. Now I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] for a question.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman realizes perfectly well that under the ruling of the Chair on the whole amendment that ruling covered every part of the amendment, so that we are now presented with the situation that but a few moments ago the Chair ruled on that part of the amendment that is now before the House and against which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes the point of order, and therefore the call for a second ruling, following on the heels of the other ruling, is dilatory and out of order. I will ask the gentleman, Does he not recognize that this amendment has been ruled on as being in order?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the sense in which the gentleman asks the question, I will say no, for this reason: That you have now a concrete proposition presented to you. What is past is behind us, and it is not a part of one amendment that is being presented to the House. It is a single affirmative proposition. It must have been a single affirmative proposition or it could not have been divided from the rest. One of these affirmative propositions has disappeared, as if it had never existed. The other stands in front of you now, to which the point of order is raised, and the situation that confronts you is not the situation of a division——

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. For a question.

Mr. HOBSON. I am quite sure the gentleman will recognize this: That the second part, upon which the ruling is now requested, was substantive and was not affected by the first part, which reduced the appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. HOBSON. That, whether it was or not, the second part was the one that was included in the ruling.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not admit that.

Now, if I have the floor, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am going to read from Crutchfield's Manual. Here are his remarks on the division of the question in the star-route case, which was referred to earlier in the day. I am aware that a text book is not so controlling as a decision, but Crutchfield was an able parliamentarian. Here is what he says in commenting on the star-route case. I am reading from the Constitution, Manual, and Digest of the House of Representatives, first session Fifty-third Congress, page 268:

> It will be noted that the point of order was made against the amendment as a whole. The propositions contained in the amendment were divisible, namely, first, to substitute $49,500 for $50,000; and, second, the provision "to be disbursed in such manner," etc. The second branch of the amendment did not of itself result in a reduction of the amount carried by the bill, and had a division of the question been demanded and a point of order made against the latter branch the provision changing the law as to the manner of disbursements would no doubt have been held out of order.

Now, before the Chair decided on the first point of order, I made a parliamentary inquiry as to whether that moment was the time for me to demand a division of the question. The Chair replied by asking me what my own opinion was. I expressed my opinion, and it is still my opinion, that the proper time to demand a division of the question is when the question is about to be put and not when the point of order has been raised. The Chair decided the amendment as offered to be in order. Clearly it must have been in order only because it carried a reduction in terms. Now that the committee has voted down that reduction, the proposition on which we are about to vote is at best merely a retrenchment, and therefore not in order unless presented by a committee having jurisdiction. I am sending the comment of Mr. Crutchfield to the Chair, so that he can read it for himself.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts demand a division of the question, but recalling the rule that a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible, I did not suppose that the gentleman was serious in his demand.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The committee has already divided the question on the demand of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. The division was after the motion to strike out and insert and before the legislative proviso.

Mr. MANN. But the motion of the gentleman from Kansas was to strike out $49,000,000 and insert something in its place.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Is it in order for me to withdraw my point of order?

Mr. HOBSON. I will say that he can not withdraw it until my point of order is disposed of first. I am willing to withdraw my point of order if the gentleman will withdraw his.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say that there have been three or four hours of the public time wasted on this question, which ought to have been settled in 10 minutes, and I am willing to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order against the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will renew the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Then I make the point of order against the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I simply repeat that the Chair has ruled upon the point and the request is dilatory and out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may be in error in regard to this matter, and if he is in error of course it will not be taken as a precedent. It seems that, the Chair having ruled on the proposition as a whole, and there having been no demand for a division for the purpose of the ruling, it brought this entire amendment before the House for a vote. Then it was the right of any Member to raise the demand for a division of the proposition for a vote, and by a failure to adopt any part of the amendment when it was subdivided that vote virtually amended the amendment. The Chair does not think this action places the portion now before the House in such a parliamentary situation as that it is subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "liquors," in the amendment, insert the following: "Smoking and chewing tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes."

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield after I have opened the discussion.

Mr. HOBSON. Very well, I will not ask it now if the gentleman desires to discuss it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is generally conceded that nine times as many men use tobacco as use liquor, that it is a greater evil perhaps because more insidious and more habit-forming drugs are contained in various preparations of tobacco, especially in the last item—snuff. I am informed by men who have made a special investigation that the habit-forming power of the snuff generally distributed through the country is very great. The advertisements in the magazines of beautiful pictures of men smoking tobacco does a great damage to the welfare of citizens.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he knows of any State in the Union where it is against the law to sell all these articles?

Mr. STEENERSON. Some of them. I think it is against the law in my State to sell cigarettes, and it ought to be against the law to sell snuff, because it contains so many habit-forming drugs.

Mr. HOBSON. I am asking for information. Does the gentleman recommend to the people of this country——

Mr. STEENERSON. Kansas prohibits the sale of cigarettes.

Mr. HOBSON. And cigars and snuff?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not know about that, but I would be willing to compromise on cigarettes and snuff. I think there is no more insidious evil than the distribution of advertisements of tobacco in all its forms. You see in all the magazines pictures of men seated in easy chairs in luxurious apartments smoking cigarettes and cigars and pictures of golden snuff-boxes that they use to imbibe the snuff. The Government should not aid in distributing these advertisements among the people. They are more injurious in their tendencies than those containing advertisements of fraudulent investment schemes or even of liquors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the gentleman's amendment by way of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

And "playing cards and poker chips."

Mr. STEENERSON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that is not germane.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a great many young men go astray playing poker, and there are so many alluring advertisements of cards and poker chips that it seems to me, so long as we are venturing on the field of reform, that we ought to be thorough and workmanlike.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What will the first vote come upon if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. On the substitute.

Mr. MANN. A substitute is not in order to be submitted until the original amendment is perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offered his amendment as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I did.

Mr. MANN. A substitute can be offered for the original proposition, but I do not understand that a substitute can be offered to an amendment to the original proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. The substitute can be voted on after the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer his amendment as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me my substitute should be adopted if we are going into these other reforms.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is a substitute for the amendment to an amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I make the point of order that, there having been discussion, it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take five minutes, but I wanted to say to the gentleman from Minnesota, when I asked him the question, that I intended to vote for his proposed amendment and also for that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I want to point out that I recognize perfectly well that it would, at least the last one, be harmful to the original amendment. Of course, the gentleman from Pennsylvania realizes that there is not a State or county or municipality in the Union where there is a law against the sale of poker chips or of playing cards.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. There is a law, I think not repealed, that imposes a penalty for the sale of playing cards in the State of Illinois, enacted in 1819, and also against the importation of billiard tables. There is a law in the State of Kansas, as I am credibly informed, that makes it a penitentiary offense to use playing cards in gaming, and there have been convictions under that law, and men are in the penitentiary for it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We still have laws in Pennsylvania known as blue laws, dating way back to 1794.

Mr. HOBSON. Does the State like to enforce those laws?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Sometimes they are not enforced any more than the liquor law is enforced in certain sections of the country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when the amendment was first proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], I made the point of order against it and the Chair stated that it was offered as a substitute, which would be in order as a substitute for the original proposition. But a substitute for an amendment to an amendment is not in order. Under the rules a proposition is in order, an amendment to that proposition is in order, and a substitute for the original proposition and an amendment to the substitute is in order, but if a substitute to an amendment were held in order, then an amendment to the substitute would be in order, thereby getting in an amendment in the third degree to the original proposition, and if this is offered as a substitute for the original amendment it is in order to vote upon it when that is reached, but, I think, not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. It is not in order to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, the vote is on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. JACKSON. I shall not detain the House very long.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close upon this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor for five minutes. The gentleman from Tennessee will be recognized when he is through.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not want to be recognized after the time has been all used by the gentleman from Kansas. He has had plenty of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from Kansas is within his rights under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then let him proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee seemed a trifle impatient with the Chair when the Chair said he would recognize the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I think I have been very patient and have occupied little time of the House in discussing this proposition. I presented it to the House in the utmost good faith, because I believed that the United States Government should no longer continue the partnership with the liquor houses and the circulation of fraudulent matter in the mails. I regret very much that the gentleman from Tennessee has been so petulant and impatient——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I object to any statement about the gentleman from Tennessee by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I am simply replying to what the gentleman said to me. I believe I have a right to reply in my own time to a statement concerning myself.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has not the right to make any remarks of that kind.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, the gentleman made it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is familiar with the rule—when debate is proceeding under the five-minute rule that it must be confined to the subject matter of the amendment. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman challenges my good faith in offering this amendment. What I said was said in reply to the gentleman's suggestion that it contains nothing but rot, and I congratulate the State of Tennessee, which is in a way committed to the subject of prohibition, that it has a Representative in Congress who stands here on the floor of the House and denounces any attempt to take out of the mails of the United States this class of literature as pure rot and hypocrisy. The gentleman saw fit to make remarks upon the result of the recent election concerning myself. It is true that I was defeated, as many other better gentleman were defeated, by a change of politics in my district, but I can not forget, Mr. Chairman, that in every little town and hamlet in that district I found from 15 to 20 men, at the instance of the agents of the breweries and liquor houses, fighting me openly because of my attitude upon the floor of this House on the temperance question and in the enforcement of the State laws. I also congratulate the State of Tennessee that the same argument that was in the mouths of the breweries in our State has followed us to the Halls of Congress and now finds proclamation from the mouth of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. And in reply to the suggestion that my amendment was not rot, the gentleman makes this reply, this unparliamentary, ungentlemanly reply, which could have no other object than to insult me personally, and, therefore, I will not be as bad as he is and characterize it, as it should be characterized, as cowardly as well as unparliamentary and ungentlemanly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not want to disturb the gentleman until he is through. I desire to be recognized when he has concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to caution the gentleman from Kansas to proceed in order.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will reduce the mails. It will take out of the mail much of the matter that never should have been circulated in the mail, and the State of Kansas does not come here asking this amendment alone for herself. We can enforce our own laws, and we do enforce them, and I venture to say that the laws concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors in Kansas are as well enforced as the State law against murder or any other misdemeanor is in any State of the Union. No newspaper published within the confines of the State of Kansas circulates these advertisements. No self-respecting editor—and two of them, I am proud to say, are on our delegation in Congress from Kansas—would accept such advertisements, and none of the papers in Kansas does so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a statement of the governor of the State of Kansas concerning the way in which the intoxicating liquor laws of Kansas are enforced.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have at no time a desire to be the least bit personal in this or other matters. I generally speak my views of men and measures. I notice the gentleman as he stands on that side of the aisle to suggest that what I have done or said in this House was ungentlemanly or cowardly. I want to say to the gentleman that he can have an opportunity, if he thinks he can make anything out of it, to say that to me anywhere, at any time, or under any circumstances. I do not want to discuss the gentleman, and I am only going to refer for a few moments to what he said to me on this floor. I said, and I say it again, that there is more contemptible rot and hypocrisy by demagogues and scoundrels about this prohibition question than any other question that was ever presented in this country. There is no doubt in the world about that. Every man that gets crooked on it feels that it is necessary for him to do something to impress somebody, somewhere, that he has more morality and more decency than other men.

I have thought only of keeping off this bill legislation of this sort that does not belong on it. So far as the question of temperance is concerned, I have cast more temperance votes and done more for the cause of legitimate temperance than a dozen men like the gentleman from Kansas. [Applause.]

I am not going to talk about him. I am sorry I referred to him again. It is just as true of the politically dead as it is of those who are actually dead, that one ought not to say anything about them except that which is good. But I can not keep from congratulating his district and this country that a man of his type should have been signally and disgracefully repudiated by his constituents.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I will not yield to you for anything.

Mr. JACKSON. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] will proceed in order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not care whether you put this measure on the bill or not, so far as whisky is concerned. I wish all the whisky was out of the world, so far as that is concerned, and nobody could get drunk or ever would be drunk, but the case would involve more definite and thorough discussion than we could give here, and I am not going to be drawn into a controversy either for or against prohibition. I have a record on that question. But I do say, if this House undertakes to put this amendment on this bill, the effect of it will be to add thousands and tens of thousands of officials in the United States to determine by the opening of every letter and every paper whether this law has been complied with or not. You can, and will, add millions under this amendment. If you want to pass upon that question, do it openly and honestly. Take up your bills and pass on them, and then we will see who is in favor of or who is against proper legislation on this question. But I do protest against attempting to put as a rider on this Post Office appropriation bill an immature and ill-considered proposition, moral in its nature, it is true, but one that has no place here because of the injury it will do to this service and to the Government. Let us deal with it as we would with any proper legislative enactment, and not attempt to incorporate it upon this bill or any other. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the original amendment now, and I do not care to take the five minutes to which I am entitled.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Is the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] still before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It was ruled out of order.

Mr. MANN. I made a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been reoffered.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], a good friend of mine, should have included me in his impatience. I recognize that at times there have been cases where people have sought cover behind an assumed support of prohibition, but I have seen many other cases where they have taken cover behind liquor.

I dare say there are some scoundrels who are associated with law enforcement, but I will answer that there is not one to a thousand as compared with those who are associated with the violation of law that this amendment is trying to reach.

I wish that the gentleman from Tennessee had permitted us to proceed at the outset on the discussion of this question on its merits. I will say to him that under the five-minute rule my discussion of it on its merits would not have been on prohibition per se, but would have been purely and simply on a ground on which I am sure he would join with me and strike hands with me, namely, that if a citizen ought not to violate law, certainly the Federal Government ought not to be an accessory to the violation of law [applause]; and that wherever in appropriation bills or elsewhere the question arises in the deliberations of this House where we could promote, under the rules, by legitimate methods the better observance of law we should do so, and particularly the law of the weaker, the State, the county, the town, law that they believe in, even if they are mistaken, law that they believe affects the very question of their perpetuity. Alcohol having been declared to be a specific for degeneracy, they recognize that in that degeneracy, the blight not only upon the man but upon his children, is involved their prosperity, their liberties, and in the end the very question of life and death.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JACKSON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 57.

Mr. JACKSON. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] took their places as tellers.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how many gentlemen desired tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, what has become of the amendment that I sent to the desk?

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. REILLY. It is an amendment that was temporarily placed on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another portion of this other amendment to be disposed of. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, after line 21, insert the following: "The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation for the purpose of weighing the mails and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid to railway companies for transporting the mails by excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 19, line 4, by striking out the figures "$24,360,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$24,826,000."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That would make the section conform to the amendments?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; that was done in order to conform with the amendments already passed. It adds $466,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has computed the items, and this covers all of them?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Will the gentleman from Iowa kindly indicate where the amendment he proposes is intended to appear?

Mr. HAUGEN. Immediately after the section under consideration. It should come in on page 17, at the bottom, after line 25.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that has been passed over.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You can not go back to page 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that paragraph has been passed.

Mr. HAUGEN. We are considering the paragraph, as I understand it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact we are considering the paragraph at the bottom of page 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] had proposed an amendment on page 19. Of course we were considering that paragraph at the bottom of page 17.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet asking to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a misunderstanding about this matter. It was understood this morning that we should recur to page 19 whenever the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] had his amendment prepared to complete these footings, and only for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. And he just asked unanimous consent to recur to page 19 for that purpose, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LLOYD. We did not revert to page 19 at all except for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that his understanding is that the paragraph at the bottom of page 17 was passed this morning while the present incumbent of the chair was temporarily absent. He was informed at the desk that the paragraph was passed over with a point of order reserved by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG]. Now, that having been attended to and that part of it having been disposed of, as well as some amendments to it having been disposed of, it would seem that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is entitled to recognition to offer his amendment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know how we will get through at that rate.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment I offer has sufficient merit to enable it to be disposed of in a very short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, after line 21, insert: "Provided, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1913, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 10 per cent per annum from the rates fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1873, for the transportation of mails on the basis of the approved weight, and amended by an act of July 12, 1876, and by an act of June 17, 1878, and an act of March 2, 1907."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that any amendment having for its object the reduction of the amount to be appropriated would be in order. I also understood the Chair to hold that any amendment germane to the proposed new legislation would be held in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the amendment is in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let us take a vote on it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the House at this time except to say that the amendment provides for a 10 per cent reduction, which will, if the amendment is adopted, amount to $5,400,000. It is a simple proposition. I think the fact that this Government is now paying an average of more than 4 cents per pound for the carriage of mail matter, and whereas the express companies pay less than 1 cent per pound for a similar service, that alone is sufficient evidence to prove the merits of the proposition and to warrant the proposed reduction.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we have had a parcel-post proposition here, adding millions of money that must be expended for the service of the Government. The general growth of the service is great, and this Congress, in order to be intelligently informed about the matter, has actually created a commission, with instructions to report as soon as practicable upon this question. I think it would be very unwise to take up a proposition of a 10 per cent reduction without any information on it at all.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the very fact that we have added the parcel-post service is another good reason why we should now reduce the pay. Every hundred pounds of express transferred from the express to the mail increases the pay to the railroad companies for carrying more than 3 cents per pound, hence the excessive, unjust, and unreasonable high rate now paid will add millions of dollars to the already excessive receipts of the railroad companies, and if for no other reason that alone would warrant the reduction proposed in the amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I tried to understand the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. I should like to ask him if his amendment reduces merely the pay to the railroads for the carriage of the mails in the matter of weight? Does he at all go into the question of pay for the railway mail cars?

Mr. HAUGEN. It reduces the amount 10 per cent on both the $49,000,000 for carrying the mail and on the $5,000,000 item for the mail cars, the reduction of 10 per cent amounting to in the aggregate $5,400,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important amendment. It may be that the railways in this country receive too much pay now, but the fact that the gentleman states that the Postmaster General recommends the reduction is no argument to me in favor of a reduction without full consideration. The Postmaster General asserts that we lose $60,000,000 on carrying second-class matter. I do not know whether we do or not. It may be that after a full consideration that great loss, as compared with the proposed 10 per cent reduction to the railways, should be taken into account. For one I am not ready to take it into account except as it may be intelligently and fully discussed. We have in the United States almost half the railways in the world carrying practically one-half of the railway commerce of the world. They go to all our States, crossing the continent. It may be that they receive too much pay. I do not know. From time to time their pay has been reduced. I hold no brief for the defense of the railways more than for any other corporations or any other individuals performing service for the Government. It is necessary that they should make improvements and betterments in order to keep pace with the rapid increase of population and commerce, and there are people who look with apprehension on the physical condition of the railways. We are told by the newspapers that they are driven to the negotiation of short-time notes for construction and repair of terminals and tracks, some at 6 per cent, and so far as I have noticed, none under 5 per cent, because they can not negotiate their bonds.

I say again, it may be that the newspaper postage ought to be increased. It may be that the railway-mail pay ought to be reduced, but in almost the closing days of this session for an amendment to be offered here hop, skip, and jump, without a chance for full consideration, to make a reduction of 10 per cent in the railway-mail pay does not address itself to my discretion as a legislator. I do not now, and never did, own a share of stock in any railway corporation, nor did I ever represent one as an attorney, directly or indirectly, in any way or form. It is important to all the people, nearly a hundred million of them, that these great arteries for the transportation of our enormous products should be fairly dealt with. Not only is it important to the railways themselves, but it is more important to all the people than it is to the railways. I notice that some people connected with railway management in New England, and some in New York, and some in Indiana, and possibly some in Ohio, have been indicted lately for not having their railways in sufficient repair. My service in this House will soon close, and while I should not regret to see the reduction of railway-mail pay, if it ought to be reduced, my judgment is that it ought not to be done until after full investigation, full consideration, and after the intelligent judgment of the majority of the House believes that it should be done, and how far it should be decreased.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAUGEN), there were—ayes 16, noes 42.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, special-delivery stamps, books of stamps, and for coiling of stamps, $800,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have been at work very hard since 11 o'clock this morning. It is plain that we can not finish this bill to-night anyhow.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to finish the bill to-night.

Mr. MANN. It is not possible to finish the bill to-night. There have been several things passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 23, at the end of line 4, insert the following:

"Provided, That from and after July 1, 1913, it shall be lawful to place any ordinary stamps of any denomination with the words "parcel post" written or printed on the package under such regulation as the Postmaster General may prescribe, and said package shall be handled, transmitted, and delivered in all respects as though it bore regulation parcel-post stamp or stamps.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this is only to bring about a change in the regulations as to parcel-post stamps, which I think all Members will call to mind has caused a good deal of trouble since the parcel post was instituted.

Mr. CANNON. This is to make the ordinary stamps available for parcel post.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think it is important from the standpoint of future regulation that we should know the amount of revenue that is brought in by the parcel post?

Mr. FOSTER. This provides that the package shall be marked "parcel post" and that the provision shall not go into effect until next July.

Mr. CANNON. And up to that time we would have the regular parcel-post stamps?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he is sure that the wording of the amendment would be construed to mean that there must be stamps of sufficient value placed on the package, as is now provided by existing law.

Mr. FOSTER. I think so. "Under such regulation as the Postmaster General may prescribe."

Mr. MANN. I suppose it would be so construed, without question.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I understand my colleague. Do I understand that after the 1st of July a special parcel-post stamp will not be placed on packages?

Mr. FOSTER. They can use the ordinary stamps.

Mr. CANNON. Does not my friend think that if we keep track of the revenue it would require a great deal of bookkeeping and a great deal of clerical attention in order to get at the revenue from carrying the mail by parcel post, which might be avoided if we continue to use special stamps?

Mr. FOSTER. This gives six months in which to make the calculation, and then, if the department should determine that it was necessary to have a further time so that they could keep track of the cost, they could keep track of the packages that go under the ordinary stamp.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose the income, we will say for the parcel post, amounts to $50,000,000, and we use the same stamps that we use on letters. They would not be sold as parcel-post stamps?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. CANNON. There is the trouble, if we are to keep track of the revenue from the parcel post. It seems to me that they should be by special stamps because the sale of the special stamps would tell the whole story. Otherwise every postmaster must examine at the place of origin the number of stamps on the package and keep an account of the postage. It seems to me it would lead to keeping of thousands of accounts that might otherwise be avoided, because the sale of the special stamps would tell the whole story.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Has the gentleman considered the fact that the fourth-class postmasters throughout the country—200,000 of them—if they keep up with this as a business proposition until the department can ascertain just what it will cost to haul the packages, will be compelled to keep accounts, and that it may entail a great deal of additional clerical assistance and cause a great deal of expense?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that will hardly be the case, for there will be six months in which to make that estimate. I believe the accommodation of the people at the end of the six months is worth something.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Illinois, that, at the proper time, when the parcel post is worked out, it will not be necessary to keep two sets of stamps. But for the present, as a business proposition, it would only be necessary for the department to have parcel-post stamps issued and sold, and then in the course of two or three years, after they have ascertained the cost of hauling the packages to the different sections of the country, the legislation which the gentleman desires might be had. But for the present, it seems to me, it would entail an interminable amount of work on the fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. There is a joint committee of the House and Senate appointed at the last session of Congress to investigate and report upon the parcel post. I want to say, as one of the committee, that as to the information to what extent the parcel post is used by the public and what is the revenue, I hope my friend from Illinois will withdraw the amendment, because we want all the information possible. I think next December, perhaps, there would be no objection to it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that as to the fourth-class post offices throughout the country many people are called upon to take the post office largely as a convenience to the people. As it is now they only have to keep one stamp account. They are charged with the number of stamps sent and they account for the number sold. This would necessitate, in order to keep track of this business, the keeping of a set of books, and when a package comes into the office—and stamps might be obtained at some other office—it would be necessary for the postmaster to keep an account of the number of stamps on the packages when posted. I can see many difficulties that would arise in keeping the books straight for several years to come. But at the end of two or three years if it is necessary to be done in order to make the parcel post a success, then the amendment that the gentleman offers might be adopted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not an experimental question whether the parcel-post rates now are too high or too low, and is there any practical method devised except by the sale of stamps to ascertain the fact?

Mr. SISSON. I think the gentleman from Missouri is absolutely right. Postmasters would have to keep track of the number of stamps, the number of packages handled, and estimate the difference between the cost of the service now and the cost of the service without the parcel post.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment, so as to read, "January 1, 1914."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment so as to make it read, "January 1, 1914." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. It seems to me that the gentleman's amendment is hastily proposed to the House, and this is a subject of too great importance for us to say at this time that on January 1, 1914, a year hence, this entire system must be changed. It is important that this business, in its initial stages, shall be kept by itself, and we ought not to say at this time that one year from now the system must be changed. Let us rather watch the development of this great new service, and let whatever amendments may be offered to it be offered after the development of it shows the necessity for them.

The reason for allowing the use of ordinary stamps on special-delivery letters is a very different subject. That is something that the sender considers important and wants to get hastily delivered. Consequently the leaning of the law and the regulations ought to be to permit him to do it in almost any way he can do it. But here is a new system for fourth-class matter, where speed is not so great an element, and where I think the people, at least, for some time to come might very properly yield personal convenience to the proper development of the system.

Mr. TILSON. And may I suggest further that, even in the case of special delivery, for a long time they used a special stamp before one was allowed to put ordinary stamps on the letter for that purpose, and that was done so that the department might find what the cost of the delivery was.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, on the suggestions that have come from all parts of the House, the gentleman has found it best to extend the time of his original amendment six months longer. The subject is so embryonic that we ought not at this time change the fundamental principles of the law, in as much as it has not been in operation for 15 days.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel and miscellaneous expenses in the postal service, office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, $1,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have it read.

Insert after line 20, page 23:

"That from and after the passage of this act all periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than 1,000 persons, or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning, or by a regularly established State institution of learning supported in whole or in part by public taxation, or by or under the auspices of a trades-union, and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by the State boards of health or industrial commissions and by State boards or departments of public charities and corrections, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter, and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter; and such periodical publications, issued by or under the auspices of benevolent or fraternal societies or orders or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, shall have the right to carry advertising matter, whether such matter pertains to such benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, trades-unions, strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, or to other persons, institutions, or concerns; but such periodical publications, hereby permitted to carry advertising matter, must not be designed or published primarily for advertising purposes, and shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, trades-unions, or other societies, respectively; and all such periodicals shall be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications: Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications issued by or under the auspices of benevolent or fraternal societies of orders, or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class mail matter, shall be limited to copies mailed to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments, or otherwise, not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price; to other bona fide subscribers; to exchanges; and 10 per cent of such circulation as sample copies: Provided further, That when such members pay therefor as a part of their dues or assessments, individual subscriptions or receipts shall not be required: Provided further, That the office of publication of any such periodical publication shall be fixed by the association or body by which it is published, or by its executive board, and such publication shall be printed at such place and entered at the nearest post office thereto."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to reserve his point of order until I can explain to him just what change is made, and then he may not press it after I make it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I again suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that it is now 10 minutes of 6 o'clock. The House, at his request, met at 11 o'clock this morning, and I am sure that he can judge of this proposed amendment a great deal better if he can only see it in print.

Mr. MURDOCK. I can explain it very easily.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, let us get through this.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; let us get through.

Mr. MANN. I would insist on reading it through, even if the gentleman from Tennessee did not.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I expect to make the point of order, anyway, but I would like to hear the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. KENDALL. That is because he is such an interesting talker.

Mr. MANN. I would like to hear the gentleman from Kansas, but I know the gentleman from Kansas will keep until to-morrow.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I can not keep the point of order until to-morrow. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that we hear the gentleman from Kansas to-night and get through.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Tennessee can not get through the bill to-night.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; but this is at the close of the Third Assistant's Office.

Mr. MANN. We have been very good to the gentleman from Tennessee, so far as time is concerned. No Post Office bill has ever proceeded as rapidly as this one has this year.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let us dispose of this, and then I will move to rise.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment that I have offered merely adds to what is known as the Dodds bill, which was passed last year, a provision that the second-class privileges shall be extended to State industrial boards. Wisconsin and other States now have industrial boards which issue monthly bulletins dealing with labor, hazardous employment, accidents, and so forth, and those bulletins are of moment. They are modern and their circulation is of a great deal more importance than other matters to which we have extended the second-class privilege. That is all the amendment does.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Would it not be better before dealing with this question to look into the report of the Hughes Commission so that we can have an understanding of this whole second-class matter and dispose of it altogether?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman that the Dodds matter, which extended the second-class privileges to these various institutions, came into the House after the Hughes report, and the privilege has been extended to many State boards, like State boards of health, and so forth. This industrial commission work is of real importance, and is modern and new and ought to have the privilege of the second class extended to it. I am not going to press the matter, however, at this late hour.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We are extending and extending, and we ought to settle the matter once and for all. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 27148, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the appropriate committee, as follows:

S. J. Res. 149. Extending the time for the survey, classification, and appraisement of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in Oklahoma; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LATE REPRESENTATIVE ANDERSON, OF OHIO.

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of an order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEKE] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of an order, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 23d day of February, 1913, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. CARL CAREY ANDERSON, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

So the order was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day that it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I move that the House do adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, January 14, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of preliminary investigations and surveys of Patuxent River as a source of water supply for the District of Columbia (H. Doc. No. 1266); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending the enactment of a law authorizing the payment of the widow or heirs of a deceased civilian employee the amount found due said employee if the amount does not exceed $500, without administration (S. Doc. No. 999); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Federal building at Denver, Colo. (H. Doc. No. 1267); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of an inspection of the several branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers made September 18, 1912, to December 5, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 987); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the concurrent resolution (S. Con. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATIVE TO IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it may lie on the table until I call it up on a subsequent day. I also ask that the joint resolution may be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to impeachment was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein):

First, that clause 5 of section 2 of Article I of the Constitution be amended so as to read as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment, except, however, that the Congress may provide by law for other methods of impeachment for all civil officers of the United States except the President, Vice President, and members of the Supreme Court."

Second, that clause 6, section 3, of Article I of the Constitution be amended so as to read as follows:

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose Senators shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present; except, however, that the Congress may provide by law for other causes of impeachment than those now provided for and other methods for the trial of all civil officers except the President, Vice President, and members of the Supreme Court."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table in accordance with the request of the Senator from Ohio.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CATRON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $121,600 for the support and education of 400 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Albuquerque, N. Mex., and $124,600 for the support and education of 400 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Santa Fe, N. Mex., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the salaries of the day watchmen at the parks in the District of Columbia from $720 per annum to $900 per annum, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $18 to pay Henry McClain for services in carrying the mail between Carlton, Mont., and the Northern Pacific Railway station, from August 1 to September 13, 1907, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for the extermination of the Rocky Mountain spotted fever, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for surveying public lands in the State of Montana, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enroll Tilla A. Provost and her son Harold Provost upon the roll of the Nebraska Winnebago Indians, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to strike from the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia Crittenden Street NW., between Iowa Avenue and Seventeenth Street, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

IOWA INDIANS.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 429), which was read and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 8117) for the relief of the Iowa Indians, with the accompanying papers, including Senate Document No. 486, Sixty-second Congress, second session, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact and conclusions of law, under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

RURAL BANKING SYSTEM IN VIRGINIA (S. DOC. NO. 1006).

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have printed as a document a proposed plan for the organization of a rural banking system in Virginia. It is a paper prepared by Charles Hall Davis, a distinguished attorney of Petersburg, Va. I make this request with the idea that it may be of use throughout the country. It is simply a plan on the subject of rural banks. It is not a very long paper, and I should like to have it printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the paper relative to rural banking may be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Are there any concurrent or other resolutions to be offered? If not, the morning business is closed.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE W. W. WEDEMEYER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced to the Senate that the House had passed a resolution appointing a committee of 15 Members, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, to attend memorial services for Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, to be held at Ann Arbor, Mich.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask to have laid before the Senate the resolutions which have just come from the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 11, 1913.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend memorial services for Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, to be held at Ann Arbor, Mich.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this resolution, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I offer the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 430) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore, to join a committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to attend memorial services for Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, to be held at Ann Arbor, Mich., on January 26, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate under the resolution Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. JONES, Mr. KENYON, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. POMERENE.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I ask leave to give notice that on Tuesday next, the 21st of this month, immediately after the routine morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I shall make some observations regarding the rights and duties of the United States in respect of tolls for passing through the Panama Canal.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the unfinished business, which is the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and to ask unanimous consent to fix a time for a vote upon the joint resolution. I feel, Mr. President, that in order to be fair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], who is in charge of the bill to be taken up immediately after the joint resolution is disposed of, I must do what I can to bring the joint resolution on for a vote.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that on Thursday of this week, immediately after the disposition of the routine morning business, Senate joint resolution 78 shall be taken up and considered continuously, and that a vote shall be taken upon it and upon all amendments that have been or may be offered to it during that legislative day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator whether many Senators or any Senators have signified a desire to discuss the joint resolution?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have heard of but one Senator who desires to speak on the joint resolution who has not already spoken.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say for myself, while I shall not discuss it I should like to hear some Senators who are better able and better prepared to discuss the question than I myself am, because my mind is unsettled at the present moment as to whether or not I shall vote for the joint resolution. I have been inclined to do so, but I am not quite certain as to whether I am sufficiently informed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I name this early date not because I am opposed to a somewhat later date, but I feel that the Senator from Vermont has a right to insist that I shall do everything in my power to bring the joint resolution to a vote, inasmuch as, having had unanimous consent for the consideration of his bill upon the disposition of this joint resolution, he can not move until we do vote upon the joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite sympathize with the view the Senator has expressed and his desire to be courteous toward the Senator from Vermont, yet I think the date the Senator suggests is too early. I think if the Senator would ask for a vote on the joint resolution upon some day next week, probably there would be no objection; say a week from Thursday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will then change it to a week from Thursday. I think that would probably be satisfactory to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ROOT. I feel a little troubled about the prospect of having one of our hard and fast unanimous-consent agreements shut down the discussion of this proposed constitutional amendment. I am in favor of the principle of the amendment. I think I reported to the Judiciary Committee favorably the original joint resolution introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] with some slight changes. That has now been reported to the Senate with still further changes. But it is a matter of very great importance, and it seems to me what we ought to do is to discuss it. I should like some course to be followed which would compel the mind of the Senate to be put upon this measure before we vote on it. It would be very unfortunate if we had to vote without having thought about it. Would not that purpose be answered by making it a special order for consideration without having an absolute time fixed?

Mr. LODGE. It is now the unfinished business and comes up every day automatically. A special order for its consideration is not required.

Mr. CUMMINS. I quite agree with the Senator from New York, but if we fix it for Thursday of next week, and then allow the legislative day for its consideration, there is no possibility of cutting off debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in the meantime it comes up automatically at 2 o'clock each day until that time, and unless it is laid aside it can be discussed.

Mr. ROOT. I will agree to any course so long as we shall not find ourselves face to face to a vote without anyone having discussed it or our minds having been put on it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say that I intend, in the meantime, to make some observations on it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I was about to announce this morning, when the unfinished business should come before the Senate, that I expect to insist on its being kept before the Senate in order that it may be discussed, and not allow it to be passed over, as it has been, for weeks and weeks without anyone having said anything about it. That would give everyone an opportunity to express his views with respect to it.

But I agree with the Senator from Iowa that some time should be fixed for a vote. In the meantime I hope Senators will take the opportunity to discuss the joint resolution, because it is a very important measure. I have said all probably that I shall desire to say about it, but I shall hope to hear other Senators express their views upon this question, which I regard of much importance to the country.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. There are one or two Senators not present who I know are very much interested in the joint resolution, and if the Senator from Iowa will not press his request for unanimous consent for a vote, but simply bring up the measure as the unfinished business and insist upon its consideration for a day or two, I should think it would be more desirable.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not feel that I can do that. The Senator from Kansas must, I am sure, appreciate the obligation that I feel toward the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Iowa wishes to get the joint resolution out of the way.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Vermont had his bill, by unanimous consent, fixed for the time after the disposition of this joint resolution. He comes to me, naturally, and says, "You must keep the joint resolution before the Senate and have a vote upon it and dispose of it." I recognize the validity of that position. If we could have a time fixed for a legislative day in which we were to dispose of it, I think he would be wholly satisfied with that arrangement.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, we have been occupied during the whole of this session to a great extent with the trial of the impeachment case, so that there has not been any opportunity to consider and deal with other matters of serious importance. This subject broadens out in several directions. There is a joint resolution now in the hands of the Judiciary Committee relating to the change of the date of inauguration. That involves the broad question of the arrangement of our short term of the meeting of the old Congress, and legislation by the old Congress after the new Congress has been elected. I think there is a very general feeling that if we are to amend the Constitution in this particular, if we are going through the process of a constitutional amendment relating to the term of office of President, we ought to consider and deal with the present anomalous arrangement regarding the beginning of the presidential term and the beginning of the term of the new Congress elected at the same time with the President. As it now stands, we elect a President and a new Congress in the first week in November. Then, while this newly elected President and newly elected Congress stand about for four months waiting for their opportunity, the old President and the old Congress proceed with the government of the country. There are many inconveniences and evils arising from that arrangement. The reasons which led to the establishment of that long intervening period in the early history of the country no longer exist.

The whole subject is now treated in a report which is pending before the Judiciary Committee, and I think it ought to be considered at the same time that we consider this proposed amendment regarding the length of the term of the presidential office.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought I yielded to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I do not want to give up my right to the floor.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from New York what necessary connection he thinks there is between the mere fixing of the term and the time of the commencement of that term, and why the two should be considered together?

Mr. ROOT. Of course, Mr. President, we could change the length of the term without changing the time for its beginning, but if we are going through the process of a constitutional amendment about the term of the President, it certainly would be prudent to make whatever change we are going to make in one amendment and with one submission to the people.

Mr. WORKS. However, the amendments relate to different sections of the Constitution and can not be considered together. There would have to be a separate vote upon them, and they would necessarily have to be considered separately. I fail to see any connection between the two that would involve any joint discussion of them. The discussion of one or the other might retard action upon either, and might have some effect upon the passage of one or the other, which I think should not happen.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who rose a moment ago.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator from Iowa not to press for unanimous consent for a vote to-day, but to content himself with having the matter taken up as the unfinished business, and to insist upon its consideration. That would be much more satisfactory to me, because, as I have said, I know of one or two Senators, who are not now present, who would like to be present before a positive date is fixed for a vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize that the Senator from Kansas can prevent a unanimous-consent agreement; but I think any Senator who wants to debate the joint resolution would have a better opportunity under my proposal than he would if it were taken up this afternoon.

In answer, however, to the Senator from Kansas, I will say that if the unanimous consent is not granted I shall feel it my duty to insist upon the consideration of the joint resolution at 2 o'clock, and that we proceed with it until it is acted upon, or until it is displaced by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution. Of course, I do not suppose the Senator from Iowa would want to unduly press it to a vote; but if he gets a vote within the next week or so, I suppose that would be acceptable.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think anyone can charge me with having unduly pressed the joint resolution. It has been the unfinished business for a long time. I tried very hard to get a vote upon it at the last session, as Senators know, and I think, when I have suggested that 10 days nearly shall elapse before we proceed with it, and then that the vote shall be taken during the legislative day named, I have given every opportunity to consider the question that fairness would require.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will defer his request until later in the day, I probably shall not make any objection to it; but I would rather it should not be pressed just at this time.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. In this connection I desire to give notice that, unless some time is fixed for a vote upon the joint resolution, I shall insist upon its being kept before the Senate. That will give every Senator an opportunity to discuss it, if he so desires; but it seems to me that it has been postponed long enough and that the Senate should consider it at this time. Of course, if a unanimous-consent agreement can be arrived at which will fix the time for voting, I have no objection to that at all; but otherwise, I repeat, I shall insist upon the regular order when the joint resolution comes up for consideration.

Mr. BRISTOW. For the present I shall have to interpose an objection to the fixing of the date proposed. I may withdraw that objection later on during the day when the Senator again brings up the joint resolution. For the present, however, I would rather not have that date fixed.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, has morning business closed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business has closed. That announcement has been made, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has been recognized. The Chair, however, will receive anything which Senators may now desire to offer by unanimous consent.

PETACA LAND GRANT.

Mr. ROOT. I ask leave to submit a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, in the absence of objection.

Mr. ROOT. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 7385) to relinquish the claim of the United States against the grantees, their legal representatives and assigns, for timber cut on Petaca land grant, to report it without amendment, and to submit a report (No. 1106) thereon.

Mr. CATRON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield? The Chair had recognized the Senator from Connecticut, and he yielded for the introduction of morning business.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

PROTECTION OF BIRDS.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, as the bill in regard to which I desire to address the Senate is very short, I ask that the Secretary read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill referred to by the Senator from Connecticut will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 6497) to protect migratory game and insectivorous birds in the United States, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all wild geese, wild swans, brant, wild ducks, snipe, plover, woodcock, rail, wild pigeons, and all other migratory game and insectivorous birds which in their northern and southern migrations pass through or do not remain permanently the entire year within the borders of any State or Territory, shall hereafter be deemed to be within the custody and protection of the Government of the United States, and shall not be destroyed or taken contrary to regulations hereinafter provided therefor.

SEC. 2. That the Department of Agriculture is hereby authorized to adopt suitable regulations to give effect to the previous section by prescribing and fixing closed seasons, having due regard to the zones of temperature, breeding habits, and times and line of migratory flight, thereby enabling the department to select and designate suitable districts for different portions of the country within which said closed seasons it shall not be lawful to shoot or by any device kill or seize and capture migratory birds within the protection of this law, and by declaring penalties by fine of not more than $100 or imprisonment for 90 days, or both, for violations of such regulations.

SEC. 3. That the Department of Agriculture, after the preparation of said regulations, shall cause the same to be made public, and shall allow a period of three months in which said regulations may be examined and considered before final adoption, permitting, when deemed proper, public hearings thereon, and after final adoption to cause same to be engrossed and submitted to the President of the United States for approval: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect or interfere with the local laws of the States and Territories for the protection of nonmigratory game and other birds resident and breeding within their borders, nor to prevent the States and Territories from enacting laws and regulations to promote and render efficient the regulations of the Department of Agriculture provided under this statute.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of $10,000.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, this bill, as will be noted, was reported back to the Senate in April, 1912. It has been on the calendar nine months, during six of which Congress has been in session. I have not tried to hasten action upon this measure, for several reasons. I think it probable that few Senators outside of the members of the committee which considered it have had the time or the opportunity to inform themselves with regard to its provisions. It presents a subject in which but few Senators have heretofore taken any interest, and a subject which at first is likely to arouse antagonisms which I believe are wholly undeserved. But, Mr. President, I think the time has come now when it is my duty to ask the Senate to consider some of the reasons which are urged in support of this measure, for it has been made clear to me that thousands, and I think I may say millions, of our constituents believe this bill to be of as high promise and importance as any remedial measure now pending before Congress.

Before I come to the question of ways and means, I want to put into the RECORD some of the reasons why Congress should find ways and means to protect the bird life of the country, and although my personal interest in the subject is considerable and my conclusions have been reached after some years of observation, I shall not assume to take the time of the Senate to do more than call attention to the opinions of those who speak as experts and who have made birds and their habits a life study.

As it is highly probable that very few Senators have had the time to read the reports of the Senate and House committees, or the printed report of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, bearing upon this subject, I will first call attention to some of the data and conclusions found in these reports.

Mr. LEE of Georgia, from the House Committee on Agriculture, has the following observations to make on pages 1 and 2 of his report on H. R. 36, a bill to protect migratory and insectivorous game birds of the United States:

The committee gave a public hearing and a large amount of testimony was produced before it to sustain the provisions of the bill. It appeared that most of the States of the Union have laws more or less effective in the protection of game or other birds resident and breeding within their borders, and by special reservation in the bill none of its provisions are to be deemed to affect or to interfere with these laws as to such birds or to prevent the States from enacting laws and regulations in aid of the regulations of the Department of Agriculture provided for in this bill. Through these local laws, however, it appeared that because of their nomadic habits little or no real protection was afforded water fowl and other migratory game birds, and therefore, to secure for them adequate protection, particularly in the spring, when they are on their way to their nesting grounds, they should be placed under the custody of the General Government. It also appeared that some of the most valuable species of these nomads would soon be extinct unless immediate congressional protection is afforded.

It was clearly shown that the economic aspect was twofold. The game birds yield a considerable and an important amount of highly valued food, and if given adequate protection will be a constant valuable asset. The insectivorous migratory birds destroy annually thousands of tons of noxious weed seed and billions of harmful insects. These birds are the deadliest foe yet found of the boll weevil, the gypsy and brown-tailed moths, and other like pests. The yearly value of a meadow lark or a quail in a 10-acre field of cotton, corn, or wheat is reckoned by experts at $5. The damage done to growing crops in the United States by insects each year is estimated, by those who have made the matter a special study, at about $800,000,000.

The majority of the committee believe that to give Federal protection to these birds is no invasion of State rights, for being migratory they belong to no single State, but to all the States over which they pass and within which they simply pause for food, rest, or breeding. It is believed that the question is purely a Federal one and that under the strictest construction of the Constitution these migratory birds may and should be subject and entitled to national protection by act of Congress.

The report from the Senate committee, beginning at the bottom of page 2, argues the case for the birds in the following language:

Anyone who has read recent estimates of the decrease in insectivorous birds and the increase of herbivorous insects can readily believe that as the mammals succeeded reptiles insects will soon possess the earth unless some agency is discovered to check their increase.

We are prone to bear the usual and slowly accumulating burdens with dull resignation and patience. The life and property losses and taxes that are inherited and constant we take for granted. It is the concentrated and unusual calamities that shock and excite the spirit of opposition and the desire to prevent a recurrence. By the sinking of the Titanic 1,300 lives were lost, and the world was filled with fear and sympathy. Tuberculosis claims 190,000 victims a year in this country and pneumonia 160,000, yet we bear this awful loss of life with the passing comment that it is a great pity.

The San Francisco earthquake destroyed property to the value of $400,000,000. This loss was the superinducing cause of the panic of 1907, which reduced values by the billions. If it were known to-day that the country would suffer another such loss within its borders in the year 1912, the wheels of progress the world over would halt in sympathetic fear.

A short time ago the farmers of the country, especially in the Northwest, were much agitated because of the proposed reciprocity agreement with Canada. The loss which they, together with other farmers of the country, will suffer this year and which will benefit no one will exceed by hundreds of millions of dollars the total value of the entire wheat crop of the Nation.

As long ago as 1904 Dr. C. L. Marlatt, basing his estimates on the crop reports of the United States Department of Agriculture, asserted that the loss to the agricultural industries in that year caused by insects alone could be conservatively placed at $795,100,000, and this estimate does not include a dollar for the use of insecticides.

Mr. Forbush, in his most comprehensive book entitled "Useful Birds," maintains that the insect pests destroy agricultural products to the value of $800,000,000 a year. We use large numbers so freely in these days that hundreds of millions mean no more to us than hundreds of thousands did a few years ago. There are about 600 colleges in the United States to-day. Their buildings and endowments have been centuries in accumulation. The value of the college and university buildings is estimated at $260,000,000 and the endowments at $219,000,000. If they should be destroyed to-morrow—buildings and endowments—the insect tax of one year would replace them and leave a balance sufficient to endow 32 new universities in the sum of $10,000,000 each.

We have in this country to-day about 20,000,000 school children, and the cost of their education has become by far the heaviest tax laid upon the surplus of the country, yet it costs more by many millions to feed our insects than it does to educate our children. If there is any way in which this vast and destructive tax upon the national income can be prevented or stayed or resisted in any appreciable measure it would seem to be the part of wisdom to act without delay.

For many years individuals, at their own expense, and voluntary societies and representatives of the civilized nations the world over have studied and estimated the value of birds to the human race. We call attention at this time to but a few of the estimates made, and such as seem to be fair and reliable, but enough, we think, to prove that in this country at least we have ruthlessly disturbed, if not destroyed, one of nature's wisest and most valuable balances between the birds and their natural food, and it is clear to those informed upon this subject that unless radical and immediate measures are adopted to restore a sure, safe, and natural equilibrium between insectivorous birds and their foods the time will soon come when the annual loss caused by insects to agriculture in this country alone will be counted in billions instead of millions of dollars.

Most insects, like the green leaf louse, or aphis, so destructive to the hop industry and many other of our most valuable fruits and vegetables, reproduce their kind at the rate of ten sextillion to the pair in one season. This number means 40,000 for every square inch of land that is above water. Placed in Indian file, 10 to the inch, it would take light, traveling at the rate of 180,000 miles per second, 2,500 years to reach the file leader.

The potato bug is less fecund. One pair will reproduce from fifty to sixty millions only in a season. The natural increase of one pair of gypsy moths would defoliate the United States in eight years.

These estimates I quote from Prof. Forbush, who in turn gathered them from the United States Biological Survey, and we may say that these cases are fair examples of the reproductive powers of the insectile world. Locusts, army worm, and chinch bugs, unless checked in procreation, soon become countless hordes, devastating wide areas of the earth's surface.

It is to be remembered that insects live to eat. Some of them increase their size at birth 10,000 times in 30 days. Dr. Lintner, of the New Jersey Board of Agriculture, reports 176 species of insects attacking the apple tree. (U. S. Biological Survey.) About the same number attack the peach, plum, and cherry trees. Dr. Packard finds 400 species feeding upon the oak; 300 attack the conifera. The number feeding upon cereals, grains, and garden crops is also very large.

The reports of the Bureau of Entomology show that destruction by some insects is widely spread and are increasing. Dr. Marlatt estimates that the loss to the wheat-growing States in 1904 occasioned by the Hessian fly was about $50,000,000. Dr. Shinar estimates the damage done to crops in the Mississippi Valley caused by the chinch bug in one year as high as $100,000,000. The Rocky Mountain locusts, in years of their greatest activity, caused the States of the Northwest more than $150,000,000. Dr. Lintner estimates the annual loss to farmers caused by cut-worms at $100,000,000. The terrible loss of $800,000,000 a year is fairly easy of proof.

That the worm does not eat everything that grows is due to several causes—weather, parasites, fungi, insect diseases, insectivorous birds, and mechanically applied poisons, which are expensive, unnatural, and dangerous. However large may be the share of parasites, fungi, and weather in checking the increase of destructive insects, investigation shows that it is lamentably insufficient, and the briefs of the bird defenders pretty clearly indicate that the birds have been, are, and will be without question one of the most important agencies in staying the inroads of insect devastation. Men who have had this subject at heart and in hand for many years assert that bird life is one of the most indispensable balancing forces of nature.

We cite a few instances in support of the foregoing. All birds eat, and most of them eat most of the time, and they eat insects and little else. The old bird has just as keen an appetite as the young bird, and he is much larger and his daily ration is almost incredible.

Mr. Treadwell, of the Boston Society of Natural History, fed a young robin 68 angle or earth worms in one day. Mr. Nash, of the Ontario Department of Agriculture, fed a robin 70 cutworms a day for 15 days. A young crow will eat twice its weight a day of almost anything that happens to be brought before him. The State ornithologist of Massachusetts, Mr. Forbush, by careful and painstaking observation has collected much reliable information on this subject. He has seen two parent grosbeaks in 11 hours make 450 trips to their nests carrying two or more larvæ at a time. Sparrows, chickadees, vireos, martens, and warblers made from 40 to 60 trips an hour with their beaks filled with all manner of insects. Under the supervision of the United States Biological Survey the crops of 3,500 birds were examined. Thirty grasshoppers and 250 caterpillars were found in the crops of cuckoos. In the crop of a nighthawk were found 60 grasshoppers and in another 500 mosquitoes; 38 cutworms were found in the crop of a blackbird; 70 cankerworms were found in the crop of a cedar bird. Prof. Tschudi estimates the diet of a song sparrow at 1,500 larvæ a day.

Mr. Forbush estimates that a single yellow-throated warbler will consume 10,000 aphids or tree lice in a day. Scarlet tanagers have been seen to eat 35 gipsy moths a minute for 18 minutes at a time.

To quote further from Mr. Forbush on Birds:

"More than 50 kinds of birds feed upon different varieties of caterpillars; 38 varieties are known to feed upon devastating plant lice.

"Mr. McAtee, of the United States Biological Survey, reports that several of the most destructive species of scale insects are the food of not less than 50 kinds of birds. Beetles, cutworms, grubs, borers, locusts, grasshoppers, crickets, in fact most all of the injurious insects are food for a very great majority of the different kinds of birds.

"It is the general belief that the so-called game birds are seed rather than insect eaters. The fact is that the bulk of food of most of this class of birds consists of insects when insects are to be had.

"The quail, though not a migratory bird, and therefore not within the scope of the pending bill, should, however, be carefully protected by State legislation. It feeds upon locusts, chinchbugs, cotton worms, cotton-boll weevils, army worms, Colorado potato beetles, striped cucumber beetles, grasshoppers, ground beetles, and many others. The young feed almost entirely upon insects. Such seeds as they eat are largely those of the harmful weeds, as ragweed, smartweed, red sorrel, mercury, pigweed, and the like. If the quail can be protected and become numerous and fearless, they would become the most useful assistants and allies of the farmer.

"This is true in a great measure of the partridge or ruffled grouse, snipe, plover, sandpiper, woodcock, wood duck, and black duck, once so common all along the shores of our streams and pools. They were formerly great insect eaters, but they have been so persecuted by the hunters that they hardly now ever live there."

Prairie chickens, like the grouse and wild turkey, feed their growing young almost entirely upon insects, and the mature birds prefer this diet.

We quote from Prof. Forbush a few instances of crops saved from destruction by birds:

"In Pomerania an immense forest was in danger of being utterly ruined by caterpillars and was unexpectedly saved by cuckoos, which though on the point of migrating established themselves there for weeks and so thoroughly cleared the trees that next year neither depredators nor depredations were seen.

"In Europe, in 1848, there was a great outbreak of gypsy moths. The hand of man seemed powerless to work off the affliction, but on the approach of the winter titmice and wrens paid daily visits to the infested trees, and before spring the eggs of the moths were entirely destroyed.

"According to 'Reaumer,' the larvæ of the gypsy moth were at one time so numerous on the Limes at Brussels that many of the great trees were nearly defoliated. The moths swarmed like bees in the summer. If one-half of the eggs had hatched the following spring scarcely a leaf would have remained in these favorite places of public resort. Two months later scarcely an egg cluster would be found. This happy result was attributed to the titmice and creepers, which were seen busily running up and down the tree trunks.

"In 1892 Australia was afflicted with incursions of immense clouds of locusts. In Glen Thompson district several large flocks of ibis were seen eating the young locusts in a wholesome manner. Near Victoria swarms of locusts were seen in a paddock. Just as it was feared that all the sheep would have to be sold for want of grass, starlings, spoonbills, and cranes made their appearance, and in a few days made so complete a destruction of the locusts that but a few acres of grass were lost.

"When Utah was settled the first year's crop was almost utterly destroyed by myriads of crickets that came down from the mountains.

The first crop having been almost destroyed, they had sowed seed for the second year. The crop promised well, but when the crickets appeared the people were in danger of starvation. In describing the condition Mr. George Q. Cannon said: 'Black crickets came down by millions and destroyed our grain crops, promising fields of wheat in the morning were by evening as smooth as a man's hand—devoured by insects. At this juncture sea gulls came by thousands, and before the crops were entirely destroyed these gulls devoured the crickets, so that our fields were entirely free from them." Several times afterwards the crops were attacked by the crickets and were saved by the gulls.

"In 1865 locusts hatched out in countless numbers in Nebraska. Some fields of corn and wheat were entirely destroyed by them. A large field of corn near Dacotah City was literally covered with locusts, and there were indications that not a stalk would escape. About this time blackbirds appeared in large numbers and made this field their feeding ground. The locusts gradually disappeared. Although the crop had to be replanted, it was due to the birds that a crop was raised at all. Many fields were saved with but slight loss by the work of blackbirds, plover, quail, and prairie chickens.

"A severe outbreak of forest tent caterpillars occurred in New York and parts of New England in 1898. Thousands of acres of woodland were devastated, and great damage was done to the sugar-maple orchards of New York and Vermont. Birds—warblers, orioles, sparrows, robins, cuckoos, cedar birds, and many others—attacked the caterpillars vigorously, and by 1900 the plague had been so reduced that the injury was not seen.

"Increase of insects and damage by them follows destruction of birds. Frederick of Prussia, being particularly fond of cherries, was annoyed to see the sparrows destroying his favorite fruit. An edict was issued ordering sparrow extermination. The campaign against the birds was so successful that not only were the sparrows destroyed, but many other birds were either killed or driven away. Within two years cherries and most other fruits were wanting. The trees were defoliated by caterpillars and other insects, and the King, seeing his error, imported sparrows to take the place of those that had been killed.

"A few years since the harvests of France began to fail. A commission to investigate the cause of the deficiency was appointed by the minister of agriculture. This commission took counsel with experienced naturalists, and the deficiency was attributed to the ravages of insects that it is the function of birds to destroy. It seems that the French people had been killing and eating not only the game birds but the smaller birds as well. Birds' eggs had been taken in immense numbers. A single child had been known to come in at night with a hundred eggs. The number of eggs of birds destroyed in the country annually was estimated to be from eighty to one hundred millions. Before such persecution the birds were rapidly disappearing. As an apparent result of the destruction of the birds the vines, fruit trees, forest trees, grain and field crops were suffering much from destructive insects. It was concluded that by no other agency than the birds could the ravages of insects be kept down, and the commission called for prompt and energetic remedies to prevent the destruction of birds.

"The greatest losses from the ravages of the Rocky Mountain locust were coincident with or followed soon after the destruction by the people of countless thousands of blackbirds, prairie chickens, quail, upland plover, curlew, and other birds. This coincidence is significant at least. Prof. Aughey tells how this slaughter was accomplished. Vast numbers of them were poisoned with strychnine in and around the cornfields. It was done under the belief that the blackbirds were damaging the corn crop, but a great number of birds of other species were destroyed as well as the blackbirds.

"In Dakota County, in Nebraska, in one autumn not less than 30,000 birds must have been destroyed. Prof. Aughey writes thus of this destruction: 'Supposing that each of these 30,000 birds ate 150 insects daily, we then have the enormous number of 135,000,000 insects saved in this one county in one month that ought to have been destroyed by the agency of birds.' When we consider that most of these birds were migratory, and that they would have been busy in other regions the rest of the time in helping to keep down the increase of insects, the harm that their destruction did is beyond computation. The killing of such birds is not a local, it is a national, a continental loss."

All of the foregoing evidence goes to demonstrate the existence of a natural economic relation between these three orders of life. There is a sort of interdependence, and the existence of each one is dependent upon the existence of the others. But for the vegetation the insects would perish, and but for the insects the birds would perish, and but for the birds the vegetation would be utterly destroyed by the unchecked increase of insect destroyers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit an interruption?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The subject the Senator is discussing is one very near my heart, and I have been hoping the Senator would press this bill for consideration. I notice in the list of birds enumerated the wild pigeon. Does the Senator know where a live wild pigeon can be found to-day?

Mr. McLEAN. There are none; they are extinct.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is a stuffed one in the Smithsonian Institute, which is regarded as a curiosity. There was a time in my life when wild pigeons were so numerous in the country where I lived that we could pick them from the trees in the evening; the heavens were clouded with wild pigeons on certain days. And yet to-day, as I understand, there is not a live wild pigeon on this continent.

What is true of that bird is relatively true of a great many other very valuable birds, some of them song birds. The robins are being slaughtered, song birds of different kinds are being slaughtered ruthlessly, and we sit idly by and let it go on.

Last evening I spent an hour or two in looking over Hornaday's recent work on that subject, and I wish every Senator would peruse that book and ask himself the question whether the work the Senator is engaged in in trying to pass this bill is not one that ought to command the cooperation and support of every man in public life.

I am glad the Senator is discussing the subject in such an interesting way.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say that the book to which the Senator has referred, Mr. Hornaday's book, contains a photograph of the last survivor of its species—the wild pigeon—and that one is now dead.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it does.

Mr. McLEAN. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Dr. Hornaday is conceded to be one of the great naturalists of the world. He is at present a director of the New York Zoological Park.

I will add here a few items bearing upon this subject which I have gathered since the printing of the Senate report.

Mr. William A. Lucas, dean of the American Game Bird Culture, is authority for the statement that—

If the present rate of ruthless destruction of our game birds is not checked, and vermin left to prey continually upon them, they will pass out of existence with the passing of this century.

From the publication of the Clifton Game and Forest Society of North America I desire to quote as follows:

Recent conquest of nature: When the last century opened, man's conquest of crude nature had not gone far except in scattered spots. An aeroplane survey of the world showed in Europe, Asia, and America a few immense national clear farming spaces, but the earth was still almost like a Garden of Eden. Ocean swarmed with whale, seals, sea otter, and sea birds. Animal and vegetable life of Africa and America had achieved perfect balance. Africa swarmed with life, mostly monstrous floral and faunal survivals of the latter end of the Tertiary epoch, while the Quaternary bird, beast, and plant life of America was amazing. The buffalo of Africa and the bison of America perhaps equaled in number all the world's beef cattle of to-day. The measureless wild pastures were kept cropped and orderly by vegetable eaters, and the vegetarians were prevented from eating the world to a blank, greenless desert by the hungry flesh eaters, for one lion at a meal could swallow all that a buffalo had eaten in a year. In this way meat-eating animals paradoxically preserved the vegetarians by eating them; saved vegetarians from themselves, kept down their number, and thus saved plant life, for everything depends upon plant life, and plant eaters, left alone by man and other meat eaters, would surely make a desert of the earth for themselves.

Animals and primitive man: As for man and his primitive weapons, the animals regarded him as a kind of Adam in Eden, so little did they fear him. Daniel Boone had to beat bison off with sticks, and the first Boers of the Veldt were stopped for days at a time by great, curious, fearless herds.

Clearing the earth of nature: White man's travels, trade, bullets, and bacteria are turning Africa into a faunal desert, and weeds are taking the place of its great beautifully balanced floral world. America has been cut, cleared, and harrowed of most wild things until only man's good and evil, wheat and weeds, possess it. Where white man goes, either his weeds or his farms must follow. So that by the end of this century the zoological and botanical gardens will be the only place for the lover of nature to see the scant remains of the world's paradise of biologic centuries agone, when all here was a finely balanced, well-ordered Garden of Eden, an earth full of the plants and animals that the Bible tells about.

I quote now from Dr. Hornaday, whose opinions are entitled to great weight:

Show me one farmer or forester who goes out of his way and labors and spends money to protect and attract his feathered friends and I will show you 99 who never lift one finger or spend a penny a year in such work.

And again—

If there was anything I could say that would penetrate the farmer's armor of indifference and sting him into activity on this subject, I would quickly insert the stinger, even at my own cost and loss. Did you ever know a real sure-enough farmer to subscribe to a fund for game protection or to spend time and money in attending legislative hearings in behalf of bird protection and increase? I never did; I mean the real farmers who depend upon their crops for their bread and butter.

Regarding the killing of robins and other song birds as food for man in a land of plenty there can not be two opinions. It is not necessary; it is not "sport"; it is very injurious to our farmers and fruit growers, and entirely reprehensible. No self-respecting man or boy can be guilty of such wrongdoing; no civilized community should tolerate it; and no farmer can afford to permit it. I would rather that any friend of mine should be caught stealing sheep than killing robins for food or "sport."

Because negroes of the South and others who know no better are disposed to kill robins and flickers and other valuable birds is no reason why we should either destroy or permit the destruction of our best friends.

Every one of the perching birds is worth its weight in gold to the farmer. It will indeed be a sad day for the American agriculturist when the last insect-destroying bird is brought fluttering and dead to the ground; then, if never before, will he appreciate the value of the allies he has lost forever; then, indeed, when it is too late will he be willing to exchange any quantity of berries or cherries for just one pair of living robins, catbirds, or other birds so despised and neglected to-day.

It is interesting to note here that in six States—Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Maryland—the robin is a game bird and is killed by the tens of thousands annually. In Louisiana, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Pennsylvania the blackbird is legally killed without limit, although it is recognized as one of the most effective destroyers of the harmful insects and worms. In 26 of the States the "mourning" or "turtle" dove has no protection from slaughter, although it is well known to feed chiefly on weed seeds. In many of the States the spring shooting of wild water fowl extends far beyond reasonable limits. In Virginia the season does not close until May 1; in Maryland, April 10; Delaware, April 10; West Virginia, April 20; Indiana, April 15; Illinois, April 15; Nebraska, April 15; South Dakota, April 10; Pennsylvania, April 10; New Jersey, March 15; Rhode Island, March 31; North Carolina, March 31. It will be observed that in a line of States covering the entire flight of these birds shooting is allowed from the 1st of September until the 1st of May.

Dr. Joseph Kalbfus, secretary of the board of game commissioners, of Harrisburg, Pa., in his report of November 15, 1911, says:

It is sad, indeed, to consider how many there are in all walks of life who still fail to understand the work being done by sportsmen or the necessity for that work.

This is a condition brought to my notice almost daily, and I am writing this bulletin in the hope that I may say something that will cause you who may read it to take an interest in bird protection, and I care not whether the motive be religious, economic, æsthetic, humane, pathetic, or what not, only so you do something for the birds now; not after awhile, but to-day, before it is too late. How much better it would have been for this State and Nation if the question of forestry had been intelligently considered 40 or more years ago instead of now. How much better it would have been if the State had long ago thrown around her fisheries and her water supply and the health of her people the strong arm of protection that she is now attempting to extend. Our birds, once extinct, are gone forever. Remember that.

To the great majority of people birds are simply birds and nothing more; they are of no special value, either singly or collectively, because so many of us, although we have eyes, "see not." That is, we do not understand what the birds are doing. We fail to realize that birds are found everywhere throughout the known world, excepting in the center of the great deserts, and that no difference where they are found each family is doing a special work in its own peculiar way that no other family attempts to do except to a limited extent.

I some time ago had occasion to arrest one of this class, a trucker living near Harrisburg, for killing 12 robins in his cabbage patch. He admitted the killing, and said: "These birds were deliberately pulling up and destroying my cabbage plants; I know what I saw." A visit to this cabbage patch showed that many of the plants had been destroyed in some way. I saw robins vigorously pulling at and casting aside numerous plants, and it appeared from a distance that they were really doing a wrong. A closer examination demonstrated the fact that not a single root had been pulled from the ground. Every missing plant had been cut from the root below the ground line by wireworms, the larvæ of the clock beetle, not cutworms. I examined the hills where many plants had stood and took from the ground with my hands wireworms in numbers varying from 3, the least found at any place examined, to 43, the most found around any plant. These birds were doing a work for this man that he could not do for himself and at the same time gathering food for their young; and this person, calling himself a good citizen, had, without thought, without an examination, deliberately murdered these birds and left their little ones to starve in the nest. His attorney, who was with me, when shown the worms, said: "Doctor, he did not understand." This lack of understanding is the great trouble. If men only understood what the birds were doing they would not treat them as they do.

The cuckoo and the oriole appear to be created specially to destroy hairy caterpillars. The great naturalist, Audubon, writing of these two birds, said, "Their stomachs are lined with hair." And the dissection of the stomachs of either of these birds during the warm summer days will frequently show this statement to be true, a closer investigation demonstrating that while hair is found apparently growing upon the inside of the stomach it is really not the product of the stomach, but is instead the hair from the caterpillars eaten by the bird, each hair having perforated the inner lining of the stomach and remaining in that place, dissolved by the juices of the bird's stomach.

Dr. Kalbfus in this report quotes from the Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture as follows:

Each family of our birds, almost without exception, is doing a work peculiar to itself; a special work that is of great value to the farmers and fruit growers of the Nation and that entitles each family of birds to protection.

In Farmers' Bulletin No. 497, issued May 6, 1912, William L. McAtee and F. E. L. Beal, assistants, Biological Survey, make the following report as to the value of upland plover and killdeer on pages 14 to 18, inclusive:

The upland plover forms a striking exception in habits to its closest relatives, the sandpipers. While sandpipers love the vicinity of water, the upland plover frequents dry hills and prairies and is most abundant in the interior. This so-called plover breeds from Oregon, Oklahoma, and Virginia north to Alaska, Mackenzie, and Maine, and migrates over the more southern parts of the continent, passing to the pampas of Argentina to spend the winters.

From its habits the upland plover would naturally be expected to have a closer relation to agriculture than most sandpipers, and such proves to be the case. Almost half its food is made up of grasshoppers, crickets, and weevils, all of which exact heavy toll from cultivated crops. Among the weevils eaten are the cotton-boll weevil; greater and lesser clover-leaf weevils; clover-root weevil; Epicærus imbricatus, which is known to attack almost all garden and orchard crops; cowpea curculios; Tanymecus confertus, an enemy of sugar beets; Thecesternus humeralis, which has been known to injure grapevines; and bill bugs. Thecesternus alone composes 3.65 per cent of the seasonal food of the 163 stomachs examined, and bill bugs constitute 5.83 per cent. No fewer than eight species of bill bugs were identified from the stomachs. These weevils injure, often seriously, such crops as corn, wheat, barley, and rye, as well as forage plants of many kinds.

The upland plover further makes itself useful to the farmer by devouring leaf-beetles, including the grapevine colaspis, southern corn-leaf beetles, and other injurious species—wireworms and their adult forms, the click beetles, white grubs and their parents, the May beetles, cutworms, army worms, cotton worms, cotton cutworms, sawfly larvæ, and leatherjackets or crane-fly larvæ. They befriend cattle by eating horseflies and their larvæ, and cattle ticks. They eat a variety of other animal forms, such as moths, ants, and other Hymenoptera, flies, bugs, centipedes, and millepedes, spiders, snails, and earthworms. Practically 97 per cent of the food consists of animal matter, chiefly of injurious and neutral forms. The vegetable food comprises the seeds of such weed pests as buttonweed, foxtail grass, and sand spurs, and hence is also to the credit of the bird.

Notwithstanding that the upland plover injures no crop and consumes a host of the worst enemies of agriculture, it is one of the numerous shore birds that have been hunted to the verge of extinction. Can it be that the American public will allow one of the best friends of agriculture to be exterminated by hunters who care only for the momentary excitement of dropping these swiftly flying birds and the pleasure of devouring the few mouthfuls of savory flesh they afford?

The killdeer is one of the best-known American birds. It frequents cultivated lands and even roads and the vicinity of buildings. It is well named "vociferous," for it delights in repeating the loud and penetrating call of "kill-dee, kill-dee," from which its common name is taken. The killdeer nests throughout the United States and southern Canada. Some individuals spend the winter in the southern half of the United States or occasionally even farther north, while others go as far south as northern South America.

Like the upland plover, the killdeer spends much of its time away from water. It frequently nests in cornfields or pastures and, as noted above, even comes about the abode of man. These preferences naturally influence the food habits of the species, affording it an opportunity to destroy insects which are directly related to agriculture. The food of the killdeer is varied, being composed of the following principal items: Beetles, 37.06 per cent; other insects, as grasshoppers, caterpillars, ants, bugs, caddis flies, dragon flies, and two-winged flies, 39.54 per cent; and other invertebrates, as centipedes, spiders, ticks, oyster worms, earthworms, snails, crabs, and other crustacea, 21.12 per cent. Vegetable matter composes 2.28 per cent of the total food, and is chiefly made up of weed seeds, such as buttonweed, smartweed, foxtail grass, and nightshade.

Among the injurious beetles consumed are the following weevils: Alfalfa weevil, cotton-boll weevil, clover-root weevil, clover-leaf weevil, rice weevil, cowpea curculio, white-pine weevil, and bill bugs. The latter alone constitute more than 2 per cent of the whole food. The alfalfa weevil, a new and destructive pest, is relished by the killdeer, 41 being found in a single stomach. Other destructive beetles devoured are white grubs and their adult forms, the May beetles; wireworms and their imagos, the click beetles; larvæ of the genus Ligyrus, which attack sugar cane, corn, and carrots; brown-fruit beetles, which injure apples and corn; the grapevine leaf-beetles; southern corn-leaf beetle; two-striped tortoise beetle, which injures sweet potatoes; and a flea beetle which attacks tobacco and sugar beets.

Cicadas, buffalo tree hoppers, and negro bugs, the last named injuring parsley and raspberries, are some of the true bugs relished by the killdeer. Caterpillars are a favorite article of diet, and several very injurious species are eaten, as the cotton worm, cotton cutworm, other cutworms, and caterpillars of the genus Phlegethontius, which damage tomatoes and tobacco. Grasshoppers and crickets, including mole crickets, are a staple food. Two-winged flies or Diptera furnish 11.91 per cent of the food of the killdeer. Such pests as crane flies and their larvæ, known as leatherjackets, are eaten, as well as horseflies and mosquitoes and their larvæ. One stomach contained hundreds of larvæ of the salt-marsh mosquito (Aëdes sollicitans), which is one of the most troublesome of the biting species. The State of New Jersey has spent thousands of dollars in trying to reduce the numbers of this pest. The killdeer thus befriends man, but it does something also for the domestic animals, not only by eating horseflies and mosquitoes, as just mentioned, but also by preying upon ticks, including the American fever or cattle tick, which has caused such enormous losses in some parts of the South.

Crawfish, well-known pests in levees and even in corn and other fields in certain localities, are another item of the killdeer's food, and 3.62 per cent of the subsistence of the 229 birds examined was composed of worms of the genus Nereis, which prey upon oysters.

In all, 97.72 per cent of the killdeer's food is composed of insects and other animal matter. The bird preys upon many of the worst crop pests and is a valuable economic factor. There can be no logical reason for continuing to regard it as a game bird.

I will now quote from the Craftsman, which notes an instance in the experience of Germany in its modern scientific bird conservation:

Baron Von Berlepsch, called the father of modern scientific bird conservation, has equipped his large estate at Seebach as an experimental station for bird protection. His methods of feeding, his skill in imitating the natural holes found in old trees that birds use for nesting purposes, his clever and sympathetic way of making birds that nest in the grass, bushes, thickets, tall trees, dead trees, clay banks, etc., feel at home are copied by many other landowners. And the wisdom of his protection has been thoroughly proved—for at times when adjoining estates were ruined by insect pests his were fresh and unharmed. His fields and his orchards, which were supplied with nesting boxes, were free from noxious insects and caterpillars when all the rest of the neighborhood suffers from these pests.

Mr. John Davey, the celebrated tree surgeon, asserts:

That approximately $100,000,000 loss is caused in the United States yearly by reason of the decrease in the number of native song birds and the increase in the activities of the human—or, rather, inhuman—tree butcher. If we could get plenty of native song birds, no trees would be troubled by insects.

I desire here to call attention to two letters printed in the report of the hearings before your committee, one from Texas and one from Alabama, as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., March 2, 1912.

AMERICAN GAME PROTECTIVE AND PROPAGATION ASSOCIATION,
111 Broadway, New York City.

Impossible to be present at hearing of protective bills before congressional committee. Migratory birds belong to no State, and no State has right to slaughter them at cost of other States. It is purely Federal question, and Congress, under most strict construction of Constitution by Democrats like myself, can not avoid conclusion that interstate birds are as interstate commerce. An open season for wild ducks all the year in Texas and a closed season for them in States lying north is an absurdity. We kill them as they leave and kill them as they come from Mexico on their way to their nests.

W. G. STERETT,
Game, Fish, and Oyster Commission of Texas.

DEPARTMENT OF GAME AND FISH,
Montgomery, March 10, 1912.

AMERICAN GAME PROTECTIVE AND PROPAGATION ASSOCIATION,
111 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR SIRS: I am in receipt of your favor of the 8th, and have also received a communication from Senator MCLEAN. Every possible energy I possess will be exercised in bringing all available influences to bear on every Member of Congress of my acquaintance, to the end that the McLean and Weeks bills may be favorably reported and successfully passed.

I have been informed by Senator MCLEAN that there is opposition to these bills by many Members of Congress, originating by objection on the part of those who are opposed to Federal interference with powers now exercised by the States. This hostility we must overcome.

I believe that by the promulgation of educational propaganda circulated through the medium of the press of the Nation sufficient sentiment will be generated among the people to cause the various constituents of the different Members of Congress to bring compelling pressure upon their Congressmen, causing them to disregard the idea that the Nation has no right to interfere with what certain Congressmen believe to be States rights. This contention does not apply in any sense, in my opinion, to migratory birds.

I practiced law for a number of years, and was likewise a member of the legislature for several terms, and I have studied these questions. I do not believe that there is unconstitutional inhibition against Federal legislation for the protection of birds of passage.

I inclose herewith a copy of a telegram I sent to the chairmen of the Senate and House committees having jurisdiction of the bills which we are urging for passage.

Very truly, yours, JOHN H. WALLACE, Jr.,
Commissioner.

I will add to these letters a few extracts from the report of the Alabama department of game and fish, bulletin No. 3, March, 1912:

[Alabama Department of Game and Fish, Bulletin No. 3.]

CONSERVATION OF THE GAME, BIRDS, AND FISH OF ALABAMA—THE DUTIES OF GAME WARDENS DEFINED, BY JOHN H. WALLACE, JR., STATE GAME AND FISH COMMISSIONER.

THE CONSERVATION OF OUR NATURAL RESOURCES.

The progress so rapidly made in the various States looking to the preservation of the natural resources of the American Continent is a cause of delight to every naturalist and sportsman, and to all patriotic citizens anywhere and everywhere.

Perhaps no nation has ever been so abundantly endowed with the blessings of forests, mines, waterways, game, birds, and fish as the citizenship of the United States. The splendid abundance of these necessities, comforts, and luxuries of life in pristine times caused our people to prosecute a campaign of relentless annihilation upon the treasures of nature's storehouse, believing that the supply could not be exhausted.

As the star of civilization wended its relentless way toward the golden West the forests were destroyed, and the land that once had been the haunts of the deer, the bear, and the bison became transformed into fertile fields, dotted with happy homes, while the trackless wilderness blossomed at the touch of the peaceful industry of the American husbandman.

Game and birds constituted the principal part of the daily food of the early settlers. Found in its primeval abundance, the wild life of the American Continent was not deemed necessary of protection, even during the breeding season; it was not until many of our most valuable species of birds and game were slaughtered to the point of extermination did our people comprehend the immense value of the natural assets.

LOCAL GAME LAWS FAILURES.

The first effort toward game and bird preservation contemplated protection by the enactment of local laws. These statutes were most conspicuous and pronounced failures, and were openly and notoriously violated on every hand. The cause of such persistent infraction is palpable; there was no specially constituted service to enforce these statutes; no one felt called upon to prosecute his neighbor; and while all agreed that the birds and game should be protected, yet local laws were annulled by the grand juries and abrogated by the petit juries, and still the campaign of relentless destruction continued to be ceaselessly waged.

DOVE BAITING A BARBAROUS PRACTICE.

Formerly, it was the custom to scatter wheat or other provisions on fields for the purpose of attracting doves in large numbers. This practice served to collect in close proximity to the baited field practically all the doves within a radius of 50 miles. At an appointed time, hunters in great numbers would repair by daybreak to the baited field, and the rapid discharge of firearms could be likened unto the raging of a mighty battle. As many as 6,000 doves have been bagged in one field in Alabama in a single morning. Probably one-fourth more were fatally shot, being so badly wounded that they were unable to fly but a short way, only to die. The baiting of fields is but a relic of barbarism, and no surer method is conceivable by which doves can be speedily exterminated than the pernicious practice of baiting fields. This custom has been practically stopped in Alabama, and doves have rapidly increased.

THE PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

As a reciprocal obligation which is due by us to those who reside in the North, migratory game birds should be protected by the Southern States. Were it not for the fact that during the nesting and breeding season these birds are protected, it would not be long before there would be no birds to migrate during the autumn and winter seasons to this section. Birds know no State lines, and, so far as the preservation and protection of those that belong to the migratory family is concerned, it is a national and not a State question.

A few of our citizens have objected to the protection of robins. These birds nest to the north in orchards and in the immediate vicinity of the homes of citizens; they are much loved on account of their friendliness to man and because of their sweet songs during the spring. Formerly, robins were slaughtered by millions in the South, and oftentimes were fed to hogs. The sensation of horror that must have been felt by the people whose sweetest songbird is the robin would be much akin to that which we would experience if our mocking bird, the Southland's sacred songster, should migrate to Cuba and be there butchered, as robins were formerly in Alabama.

NATIONAL UNIFORMITY NEEDED.

The most imperative need of the present is a uniformity of game and bird laws applying to the States in the same latitude. Likewise national legislation should be had looking to the preservation of migratory birds, in their northern and southern migratory passage through the country, as they do not remain permanently the entire year within the borders of any particular State or Territory. These nomads should be placed within the custody and protection of the Government of the United States. The Department of Agriculture, at Washington, should be authorized to adopt suitable regulations looking to this end by prescribing and fixing closed seasons on game birds which migrate, having due regard to the zones, temperature, breeding habits, and times and lines of migratory flight.

On account of the variability of the statutes relating to the protection of migratory birds in the various States, little or no protection is afforded waterfowl and migratory song and insectivorous birds. In order that many of the most valuable species of migratory birds be saved from extinction, immediate congressional action is imperative.

PROVISIONS UNDER WHICH GAME IS BEST RESTRICTED.

By disarming the pothunter, and quelling his rapacious appetite to slaughter game for the purpose of selling it, by taking out of the fields and forests the vast black horde of negroes that formerly slaughtered game in many sections of the State, almost to the point of extinction, by the prevention of the shipping of live game and dead from our State, and in fact, by placing hunting within the reach of only those who should hunt, we have guaranteed not only to the present generation a fair supply of game and birds, but have assured to those yet to be a priceless benefaction under these splendid statutes.

SONG AND INSECTIVOROUS BIRDS THE FARMER'S FRIENDS.

As a result of scientific research of the most extended nature it has been ascertained that the cause of the prevalence of many maladies and the problem of weed control is largely attributed to the slaughter of insectivorous birds, which in the past have been wantonly murdered by the millions. Birds annually destroy thousands of tons of noxious weed seeds and billions of harmful insects; they were designed to hold in check certain forces that are antagonistic to the vegetable kingdom. The Mexican boll weevil which has made such desperate ravages on the cotton fields of Texas is steadily marching into Alabama, and it has been ascertained that birds are its deadliest enemies. A noted French scientist has asserted that without birds to check the ravages of insects human life would vanish from this planet in the short space of nine years; he insists that insects would first destroy the growing cereals, next would fall upon the grass and upon the foliage, which would leave nothing upon which cattle and stock could subsist.

The possibilities of agriculture having been destroyed, domestic animals having perished for want of provender, man, in his extremity in a barren and desolate land would be driven to the necessity of becoming canabalized or subsisting exclusively on a diet of fish. Even granting that only a portion of what the eminent Frenchman asserts is true, it is easy to glean from this theory that birds are man's best allies and should be protected not only on account of their innocence, bright plumage, and inspiring songs, but because they render to the farmer valuable assistance every day.

The wholesale slaughter of our song and insectivorous birds, which was so persistently waged in the past, has been practically stopped; even in the cities where birds were curiosities they are now seen in large numbers to the delectation of the inhabitants who delight to hear once more the clear, sweet notes of the trilling songsters of the forests.

SAVE THE BIRDS.

Those who love Alabama, who glorify her splendid history, who delight in her imperishable traditions, and who take pride in her boundless natural resources are eager to preserve and protect all that combine to fashion our magnificent State.

The principal vocation of our brave and patriotic people is agriculture, which is one of the most ancient and honorable arts known to man. Upon the yield of our fields depends the happiness and prosperity of our citizens. When there are abundant crops of fleecy cotton and our garners are full of golden grain the anthems of contentment and the cadences of joy resound throughout our realms and all the world seems set to a tune that is played by happy hearts.

We are assisted in making good crops by an army of feathered friends that work for the husbandman without pay. The part that birds play in protecting farmers from the ravages of injurious insects that prey upon the crops and orchards would be well understood if all the bright colored, harmless songsters of the trees should be exterminated. Without birds our fair State would soon become not only nonproductive, but absolutely uninhabitable.

Cruel men and wanton boys sometimes shoot for sport man's feathered allies. It would be cheaper if the rifle that discharged the shot were loaded with a golden bullet and fired into the sea. Boys were erstwhile allowed to catch and sell young mocking birds and redbirds for 50 cents each. The State is made at least $100 poorer by the act. It would be more economical in the end to give away a golden bird of the same weight. The meadow lark or each one of a bevy of quail in a 10-acre wheat, corn, or cotton field each earns $5 in a single season as an insect destroyer.

Every precaution is taken by us to prevent a thief from stealing even the most trifling of our possessions, but we are oblivious of any effort to dissuade the gunner from shooting birds upon whose existence depends our very livelihood.

Let us unite every energy we possess to save our friends, the birds, from destruction; if we do this, soon every bush will contain a singer, and every tree a choir.

I desire at this point to put into the RECORD a list of the States represented officially before your committee in favor of the pending legislation:

Forty-four of the 48 States of the Union were represented at the committee hearing by letter or in person either through their governors or their State game commissioners, or through representatives of sportmen's associations, National Association of Audubon Societies, the American Game Protection and Propagation Associations, the Boone and Crockett Clubs, the League of American Sportsmen, the New York Zoological Society, and other national associations interested in the protection proposed by the bill. All favored this legislation being added to the Federal Statutes. Three of the States—Oklahoma, New York, and Massachusetts—have indorsed the proposition by legislative act.

Alabama: State game and fish commissioners.
Arkansas: State game warden.
California: Board of fish and game commissioners.
Colorado: Game commissioner, and letter from Gov. Shafroth.
Connecticut: Commissioner of fish and game.
Delaware: Board of game and fish commissioners.
Georgia: Fish and game protective association.
Idaho: Letter from Gov. Hawley.
Illinois: State game commissioner.
Indiana: State fish and game commissioner, and letter from Gov. Marshall.
Iowa: State fish and game warden.
Kansas: State fish and game warden.
Kentucky: Fish and game commissioner.
Maine: President Maine Fish and Game Associations.
Maryland: State fish and game warden.
Massachusetts: Fish and game commission.
Michigan: State game, fish, and forestry warden, and letter from Gov. Osborn.
Minnesota: Minnesota Game and Fish Commission, and letter from Gov. Eberhart.
Mississippi: State game warden.
Missouri: State game and fish department.
Montana: State game warden.
Nebraska: Chief game warden.
New Hampshire: Board of fish and game commissioners.
New Jersey: Fish and game commissioners.
New Mexico: Game warden.
New York: Board of fish and game commissioners, and letter from Gov. Dix.
North Carolina: President North Carolina Audubon Society.
North Dakota: Letter from Gov. Burke.
Ohio: Chief fish and game warden.
Oklahoma: State game and fish warden, and letter from Gov. Cruce.
Oregon: Fish and game commission, and letter from Gov. West.
Pennsylvania: Board of game commissioners.
Rhode Island: Chairman of bird commission.
South Carolina: Chief game warden.
South Dakota: State game warden, and letter from Gov. Vessey.
Tennessee: State game warden.
Texas: Game, fish, and oyster commissioner, and letter from Gov. Colquitt.
Utah: Fish and game commissioner, and letter from Gov. Spry.
Vermont: Department of fisheries and game.
Virginia: Secretary Game Protective Association.
Washington: Fish and game commissioner.
West Virginia: West Virginia State forest, game, and fish warden.
Wisconsin: State game warden, and letter from Gov. McGovern.
Wyoming: Letter from Gov. Carey.
Nova Scotia: Chief game commissioner.

Also resolutions of the Legislatures of Oklahoma, New York, and Massachusetts, urging the enactment of the Senate bill.

And now, Mr. President, I come to the question of ways and means. I shall expect very few Members of this body will object to the ends sought to be accomplished by this bill, but I must expect that every Senator will want to know by what authority Congress seeks to establish its right to enact the proposed legislation. I shall not attempt to discuss this branch of the subject at any length at this time. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to a few suggestions which have led me to the conclusion that this law does not offend the Constitution.

When this question was first brought to my attention, more than a year ago, the friends of the bill suggested that Congress might go for its authority to that apparently inexhaustible mine of legislative indulgencies—the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. We must all admit, I think, that this clause is now held to include authority to protect the health, safety, and morals of the people in ways not anticipated by the founders, but I do not believe that it is necessary to go to that source to find constitutional support for the bill now under consideration.

It has been suggested to me by others that this bill can be defended under the grant of power to lay taxes and provide for the common defense. If the destruction caused by insects should increase during the next 20 years as rapidly as it has increased since 1893, it is urged that we may well reach a condition so desperate that the protection of the Nation against insects will be as necessary and justifiable as is now the protection of the people against contagious diseases and hostile fleets. Congress is to-day spending millions of dollars annually in ineffective efforts to protect certain portions of the country against the ravages of the army worm, boll weevil, gypsy moth, and so forth. No one will question the wisdom or legitimacy of these appropriations. If Federal aid can be invoked to restrain the ravages of migratory insects, it is asserted that Congress must have authority to use any and all legitimate means to accomplish this purpose, including the protection of birds which destroy insects more effectively and at less expense than any other instrument which it is possible for the Government to employ. Would such protection on the part of Congress be any further from the anticipations of the founders than scores of other laws now in force? For instance, than the laws which defend and protect the youth of the country against the contaminating influence of unwholesome literature, the authority for which is found in the power to establish post offices and post roads? These laws, when first proposed, were denounced as unconstitutional and void by both Mr. Webster and Mr. Calhoun, who in their day represented both horns of the constitutional dilemma upon which the Nation was impaled, until rescued by Marshall and others who had the good sense to perpetuate in the Constitution the spirit, as well as the language, of its framers.

These suggestions are worth considering, but as it is my firm belief that Congress is competent to enact this law without the aid of either of the grants of power to which I have referred, I will not discuss them further. When I have what I believe to be a good excuse I do not care to cloud it with what may prove to be an insufficient one.

A year ago I felt so uncertain of the authority of Congress in the premises that I introduced a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, giving Congress full power to protect migratory birds. Since that time, and upon a careful study of the matter, I have become convinced that every nation worthy of the name has the power to protect its migratory feræ naturæ.

In the first place wild game is not property. Under the common law and by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, wild game belongs to no one. The right to take wild game from time immemorial has always rested in the sovereignty. A State may prohibit the killing of feræ naturæ altogether, and when killed a State may attach to its use or disposal any condition it may desire. The one thing therefore, which should be borne in mind in the consideration of this subject is that from no point of view is any property or political right involved. No matter how sensitive or how justly jealous any Member of this body may be of the right of his State to enjoy supreme control over the civil, political, or jural rights of its citizens, there is nothing in the pending bill that need give him the least concern. No vested right under the common, State, or Federal law can ever be endangered, effaced, or modified by the Federal protection of the migratory birds of the air. The fact that the States have heretofore assumed and exercised control over wild game, both migratory and nonmigratory, where no discrimination has been suggested or desired, is immaterial, and the fact that there is in the Constitution no expressed grant of such control to the Congress may not be material.

It is worth while to note at the beginning of our consideration of the powers of Congress over this matter that the nations of Europe, as far back as 1873, faced a situation not unlike that which the countries of the Western Hemisphere are now facing. In 1873 the Congress of Agriculturists and Foresters moved "That the Imperial Austrian Government be requested to secure the protection of birds by means of treaties with other states of Europe." In 1875 Germany, Austria, and Italy entered into a joint declaration for the protection of birds. Since that time four international ornithological congresses have been held at different periods in London, Paris, Budapest, and Vienna, and finally, in 1906, 11 European powers ratified an international agreement consisting of 11 articles, which formed a comprehensive code for the protection of birds.

I take it for granted that should Great Britain and Mexico invite the United States to enter into a treaty agreement for the protection of migratory birds, inhabiting at stated periods all three nations, the United States would have the right to accept this invitation.

Mr. Butler, in the latest edition of his work on the Treaty-Making Power, after reviewing the history of the leading cases on the subject, says:

First. That the treaty-making power of the United States as vested in the Central Government is derived not only from the powers expressly conferred by the Constitution, but that it is also possessed by that Government as an attribute of sovereignty, and that it extends to every subject which can be the basis of negotiation and contract between any of the sovereign powers of the world, or in regard to which the several States of the Union themselves could have negotiated and contracted if the Constitution had not expressly prohibited the States from exercising the treaty-making power exclusively in and expressly delegated it to the Federal Government.

Second. That the power to legislate in regard to all matters affected by treaty stipulations and relations is coextensive with the treaty-making power, and that acts of Congress enforcing such stipulations which in the absence of treaty stipulations would be unconstitutional as infringing upon the powers reserved to the States are constitutional and can be enforced, even though they may conflict with State laws or provisions of State constitutions.

Third. That all provisions in State statutes or constitutions which in any way conflict with any treaty stipulations, whether they have been made prior or subsequent thereto, must give way to the provisions of the treaty or act of Congress based on and enforcing the same, even if such provisions relate to matters wholly within State jurisdiction.

It is a significant fact that there is pending at the present time a treaty with Great Britain which provides for the preservation and protection of food fishes in the boundary waters of the United States and Canada. This treaty includes lakes entirely within State control, as, for instance, Lake Champlain. All this may be true, and yet it will not necessarily follow that Congress can in the absence of a treaty exercise control over migratory birds or fishes. It does indicate, however, that the subject matter is one of national concern and one which the Nation only can control effectively.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I notice he says the treaty is pending. The treaty has been ratified, but the law to carry out the treaty is pending in the Parliament.

Mr. McLEAN. In this connection, the fact that Congress has in the past assumed the right to regulate the taking of food fishes in waters within State control is very important. In 1871 Congress enacted the following provision—section 4398 of the Revised Statutes:

The commissioner—

That is, the fish commissioner—

may at all times in the waters of the seacoast of the United States where the tide ebbs and flows, and also in the waters of the lakes, take such fish, or specimens thereof, as, in his judgment, may from time to time be needful for the conduct of his duties, any law, custom, or usage of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Again, in 1887, Congress enacted a law regulating the taking of mackerel on the Atlantic coast. This law was enforced for five years, and its constitutionality was never questioned. Here we have two instances of the clear assertion on the part of the Federal Government of full power to regulate and protect the migratory fishes in waters entirely under State control, "any law, custom, or usage of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." It is true that the Supreme Court has never passed upon the constitutionality of either of these acts. All I claim is that if these laws are constitutional the pending bill is constitutional.

It seems to me that the analogy between migratory birds and fishes is complete, and that the argument in favor of Federal control of migratory birds is much stronger than that which obtains in the control of migratory fishes. Take, for instance, the fishes of Lake Champlain. It is hardly possible that fish hatched within 10 miles of the southern boundary of that lake would ever get within 50 miles of the Canadian boundary, yet we know that the wild goose that may be choosing its mate in the waters of Currituck Sound in March will be in Canada in April unless by permission of some State it is killed in migration. The fishes are confined both by habit and by the element in which they live to a much smaller sphere of migration than the birds. In fact, migratory birds are bounded only by the extent of the atmosphere. Many of them that spend the summer in North America spend the winter in the Argentine Republic, or in some of the distant islands of the sea.

If I am not mistaken in assuming that the Federal Government has to the same or far greater extent the right to protect migratory birds that it has to protect the swimming fishes, the purposes of this bill have been clearly approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in a decision to which I will now call attention.

On February 12, 1912, Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court in the case of the vessel Abby Dodge v. The United States. This case arose under the act of Congress prohibiting the taking of sponges by means of diving or diving apparatus from the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida. In the opinion the court refers to the case of Manchester v. Massachusetts (139 U. S., 240) in the following language:

Again, in Manchester v. Massachusetts (139 U. S., 240), in upholding a statute of the State of Massachusetts regulating the taking of menhaden in Buzzards Bay, the doctrine of the case just cited was expressly reiterated. True, further in that case, probably having in mind the declaration made in the opinion in the McCready case, that fish running within the tidewaters of the several States were subject to State ownership "so far as they are capable of ownership while running," the question was reserved as to whether or not Congress would have the right to control the menhaden fisheries. But here also for the reason that the question arising relates only to sponges growing on the soil covered by water we are not concerned with the subject of running fish and the extent of State and National power over such subjects.

Bearing in mind that in this case the court says, "We are not concerned with the subject of running fish and the extent of State and National power over the subject," we now turn to the case of Manchester v. Massachusetts, where the court was concerned with that subject, and I now quote from the opinion in that case delivered by Justice Blatchford (pp. 262–266):

The statutes of Massachusetts in regard to bays at least make definite boundaries which before the passage of the statutes were somewhat indefinite; and Rhode Island and some other States have passed similar statutes defining their boundaries. (Public Statutes of Rhode Island, 1882, c. 1, secs. 1 and 2; c. 3, sec. 6; Gould on Waters, sec. 16 and note.) The waters of Buzzards Bay are, of course, navigable waters of the United States, and the jurisdiction of Massachusetts over them is necessarily limited (Commonwealth v. King, 150 Mass., 221); but there is no occasion to consider the power of the United States to regulate or control, either by treaty or legislation, the fisheries in these waters, because there are no existing treaties or acts of Congress which relate to the menhaden fisheries within such a bay. The rights granted to British subjects by the treaties of June 5, 1854, and May 8, 1871, to take fish upon the shores of the United States had expired before the statute of Massachusetts (Stat., 1886, c. 192) was passed, which the defendant is charged with violating. The Fish Commission was instituted "for the protection and preservation of the food fishes of the coast of the United States." Title 51 of the Revised Statutes relates solely to food fisheries, and so does the act of 1887. Nor are we referred to any decision which holds that the other acts of Congress alluded to apply to fisheries for menhaden which is found as a fact in this case to be a food fish and to be only valuable for the purpose of bait and of manufacture of oil.

The statute of Massachusetts, which the defendant is charged with violating, is in terms confined to waters "within the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth," and it was evidently passed for the preservation of the fish, and makes no discrimination in favor of citizens of Massachusetts and against citizens of other States. If there be a liberty of fishing for swimming fish in the navigable waters of the United States common to the inhabitants or the citizens of the United States, upon which we express no opinion, the statute may well be considered as an impartial and reasonable regulation of this liberty; and the subject is one which a State may well be permitted to regulate within its territory, in the absence of any regulation by the United States. The preservation of fish, even although they are not used as food for human beings but as food for other fish which are so used, is for the common benefit; and we are of the opinion that the statute is not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

It may be observed that section 4398 of the Revised Statutes (a reenactment of section 4 of the joint resolution of February 9, 1871) provides as follows in regard to the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries: "The commissioner may take or cause to be taken at all times in the waters of the seacoast of the United States, where the tide ebbs and flows, and also in the waters of the lakes, such fish or specimens thereof as may in his judgment from time to time be needful or proper for the conduct of his duties, any law, custom, or usage of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." This enactment may not improperly be construed as suggesting that, as against the law of a State, the Fish Commissioner might not otherwise have the right to take fish in places covered by the State law.

The pertinent observation may be made that as Congress does not assert by legislation a right to control pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and ports of the United States, but leaves the regulation of that matter to the States (Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How., 299), so if it does not assert by affirmative legislation its right or will to assume the control of menhaden fisheries in such bays the right to control such fisheries must remain with the State which contains such bays.

We do not consider the question whether or not Congress would have the right to control the menhaden fisheries which the statute of Massachusetts assumes to control; but we mean to say only that as the right of control exists in the State in the absence of affirmative action of Congress taking such control, the fact that Congress has never assumed control of such fisheries is persuasive evidence that the right to control them still remains in the State.

Is not this a clear intimation by the Supreme Court of the United States that Congress has the right to assume control of migratory fishes?

In New York v. Hill (184 N. Y., 126) the court, in discussing the constitutionality of the Lacey Act, says:

The object of this legislation—the Lacey Act—was to enable the States by their local laws to exercise a power over the subject of the preservation of game and song birds, which, without that legislation, they could not exert. By the Lacey Act Congress determined to aid the States in the enforcement of their game laws, but did not deem it wise to enact a game law of its own, and this for the very obvious reason that the game laws of the States vary, a variation justified in no small degree by the varying climatic conditions.

I quote this case in order that the Senate may see how easily the virgin minds of the judges of our highest courts accord to the Nation this simple and plain attribute of sovereignty which every nation must have. There seems to have been no doubt in the mind of the Supreme Court of New York that Congress could have enacted a law of its own had it so desired.

In the case of Geer v. Connecticut (161 U. S.) and other cases where the court has held that the State has final jurisdiction to protect and regulate the killing of wild game the game involved was in every instance nonmigratory, and the right of the Federal Government to control the taking of migratory birds has, so far as my research goes, has never been denied or questioned. Such observations as the Supreme Court has been led to make in cases involving the authority of Congress over ferœ naturæ clearly support my contention as it seems to me.

In considering questions which involve the general powers of the Government it is always interesting to refer to the debates and discussions in the convention that framed the Constitution, but I came to the conclusion some years ago that the Constitution was made by and for strict and loose constructionists alike. Certainly history subsequent to the formation of the Union is full of the names of strict constructionists who, when clothed with high authority, have had the courage to give to the Constitution the loosest possible interpretation when wisdom and patriotism have demanded it. This is as it should be if this Union of States is to be a political and economic success and not a political and economic failure. The foundations were laid by the fathers broad and strong and deep enough to meet the needs of the Nation however great that Nation might become. The fact that the Federal Government has for many years failed to assume or exert a dormant power is of no consequence; neither can any State or the United States lose an inherent right or power by nonuser, and these rights and powers may be concurrent. A State may and does regulate many matters which are permissive merely and may be suspended at any time by the Federal Government. In the case of Gilman v. Philadelphia (3 Wall., 713) the court used the following language:

The States may exercise concurrent or dependent power in all cases but three:

1. Where the power is lodged exclusively in the Federal Constitution.
2. Where it is given to the United States and prohibited to States.
3. Where, from the nature and subjects of the power, it must necessarily be exercised by the National Government exclusively.

It is no objection to distinct substantive powers that they may be exercised upon the same subject. It is not possible to fix definitely their respective boundaries. In some instances their actions become blended. In some the action of the State limits or displaces the action of the Nation; in others the action of the State is void, because it seeks to reach objects beyond the limits of State authority.

The defendants are proceeding in no wanton or aggressive spirit. The authority upon which they rely was given and afterwards deliberately renewed by the State. The case stands before us as if the parties were the State of Pennsylvania and the United States. The river being wholly within her limits we can not say the State has exceeded the bounds of her authority. Until the dormant power of the Constitution is awakened and made effective by appropriate legislation, the reserved power of the States is plenary, and its exercise in good faith can not be made the subject of review by this court.

The junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] presented to the Senate during the second session of the Sixty-first Congress Senate Document 417, a statement prepared by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], which I think is a very conservative and sound statement of the powers of the National Government, and with his permission I quote that document, as follows:

That all necessary power over external affairs should be vested in the National Government was clearly within the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution. The first paragraph of Mr. Randolph's proposed plan was to the effect that the Articles of Confederation ought to be enlarged so as to accomplish the objects of their institution, namely, "the common defense, security of liberty, and general welfare," and the sixth paragraph declared that the National Legislature—

"ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative rights vested in Congress by the confederation, and moreover to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States will be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation." (Madison Papers, 5 Elliott's Debates, p. 127.)

After some discussion this latter paragraph was adopted, and in this form it was reported to the convention from the committee of the whole. In the convention Mr. Sherman proposed to amend it by substituting the words "to make laws binding on the people of the United States in all cases which may concern the common interests of the Union; but not to interfere with the government of the individual States in matter of internal police which respect the government of such States only, and wherein the general welfare of the United States is not concerned." But this was rejected. Finally, on motion of Mr. Bedford, it was amended so as to read, "and moreover to legislate in all cases for the general interests of the Union, and also in those to which the States are severally incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation," and in this form it was referred to the committee of detail (the word "separately" being substituted for the word "severally") as one of the resolutions to govern them in the preparation of the Constitution to be finally submitted to the convention. It will be seen, therefore, that it was the unanimous opinion of the framers' convention that power should be conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to legislate in all cases to which the States were severally incompetent. It does not appear that the members of this convention at any time changed their opinions, and it therefore must be assumed that in the judgment of these men who framed the Constitution such power was conferred by that instrument. The declared purpose of the Constitution as stated in the preamble is "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." While it is true that the preamble can not be construed as a substantive grant of power, it is valuable as reflecting light upon the powers granted, and the meaning and intent of those who framed and adopted the Constitution. In other words, the preamble states the ultimate objects to be attained by the establishment of the Constitution, and, among them, to "provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare." These are the ends to be attained, the powers conferred upon the Government are the means; but always the end is more important than the means. The powers of government must be commensurate with the objects of government, else only a semigovernment has been created.

On page 7 of the same document, 417, Senator SUTHERLAND says:

They were familiar with the great principles which governed the various nations as political entities, and knew that in the eye of international law every sovereign nation was ipso facto equal to every other sovereign nation, and that the highest law of every nation was that of self-preservation. Vattel had written in 1758, and this they read: "Whatever is lawful for one nation is equally lawful for another, and whatever is unjustifiable in the one is equally so in the other." Why should any citizen of the great Republic, proud of its strength and glory, desire that his government should be inferior in power to any government or less potential in ability to act for the benefit of the people or in the upbuilding of their country and institutions? Such governmenal authority is less to be feared under our institutions than under those of the great monarchies across the sea, because there the government dictates and the people obey, but here the people command and the government obeys, and in the last analysis it is the people who exercise the power through the government which is the servant and agent of the people. It is time we realized, not in phrases alone, but in fact, that the Government of the United States is perfect in all its limbs and not a cripple among the full-grown governments of the world.

The construction of the Constitution has undergone a process of progressive evolution. The earlier decisions of the Supreme Court, notably those written by Chief Justice Marshall, laid down the doctrine of the implied powers, and it was held that Congress possessed not only those powers which were expressly conferred, but implied power to pass all legislation necessary to carry them into effect. But from time to time Congress passed laws not referable to or capable of being implied from any one particular express power, and the legislation was upheld if the authority could be deduced from a number of express powers grouped together, or from the sum total of all of them combined. But Congress has from time to time gone beyond even this and passed laws that by no reasoning can be justified under any or all of the express powers or by virtue of any implication to be drawn therefrom. Some of these acts have been passed upon by the Supreme Court, while others have never been considered by that tribunal. Members of the court have from time to time broadly announced the doctrine that the General Government is one of enumerated powers and can exercise no authority not expressed or implied in the written words of the Constitution, yet some of the decisions can be logically justified only upon the theory that the Government possesses certain powers which result from the fact that it is a National Government and the only Government capable of exercising the powers in question. The doctrine is foreshadowed if not stated by Hamilton, when he says: "There are express and implied powers, and the latter are as effectually delegated as the former. There is also another class of powers which may be called resulting powers—resulting from the whole mass of the power of government and from the nature of political society rather than as a consequence of any especially enumerated power." There is, for example, no express language in the Constitution conferring upon the Government of the United States the power to acquire additional territory. The question first arose in connection with the Louisiana purchase. Mr. Jefferson thought the acquisition unconstitutional. Albert Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, and a statesman and lawyer of great ability, gave it as his opinion that the acquisition was valid, either as an inherent right of the United States as a nation to acquire territory or as a constitutional right under the treaty-making power. It seems to have finally been determined that this acquisition as well as some others were justified under the treaty-making power."

On page 10 of the same document, 417, Senator SUTHERLAND quotes:

Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 195):

"The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the Nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere, for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government."

Senator SUTHERLAND, in closing his article on the Powers of National Government, says:

If we are to preserve the great governmental system conceived by the Declaration of Independence and perfected by the Constitution we must realize in feeling and in fact that the rights of the States and the rights of the Nation are not antagonistic but complementary; and that the usurpation by the General Government of any State power over local affairs, and the denial to the General Government of any necessary power over national affairs are equally unfortunate and equally subversive of the spirit of the Constitution, which is the paramount law of State and Nation alike.

Again, in the report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on the Federal accident and compensation bill I find plenty of encouragement for taking the position that I do upon this matter, and I quote from that report, as follows:

(5) The Constitution is the same to-day as it was when adopted. It continues to speak with the same meaning, but the application of its provisions is capable of constant extension to meet new and altered social, political, and industrial conditions.

In the same report, on page 27, the committee quotes from the case of Debs (158 U. S., 564, 591):

Constitutional provisions do not change, but their operation extends to new matters as the modes of business and the habits of life of the people vary with each succeding generation.

In the same report, on page 33, the committee quotes from the case of Hurtado v. California (110 U. S., 516):

The Constitution of the United States was ordained, it is true, by descendents of Englishmen, who inherited the traditions of English law and history; but it was made for an undefined and expanding future.

No man in the Senate is more jealous of State, municipal, or community government than I am, but it is my belief that the way to preserve and perpetuate State and community control over local affairs is to willingly render to the Nation the things that the Nation alone can wisely and effectively control. Every time the States trust the Nation to do that which the States severally can not do, the States add confidence and strength to their right to retain control of the functions they are best fitted to perform.

While the preamble is not a part of the body of the Constitution, is it not its very soul and spirit? And if some twentieth-century Marshall should put the soul within the body, where it belongs, the throne of State sovereignty would, in my opinion, totter less frequently than at present.

The expressed purpose of the founders was to create a nation—a sovereignty that could provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare. These are the things that the confederation had failed to do. If in the throes of compromise and State jealousies and fears the purposes and main desire of the founders was defeated, then our much-boasted Government "of, for, and by the people" has never existed. If the Nation has not the power to promote by law the general welfare of the people, then we must conclude that the people in their grant of power to Congress denied to themselves the right to govern themselves wisely and well—denied to themselves the very thing the Constitution was created to secure. If this mistake was made, it is a mistake that will and should be remedied.

As has been well said, this great Nation is not a menagerie consisting of 48 different cages, each cage containing a different species of animal. It is a great Nation, composed of a homogeneous patriotic people.

Mr. President, my contention is that Congress has the implied power as a natural and necessary attribute of its sovereignty to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare of the Nation whenever the need is general and manifest, and the subject is such that no State, acting separately, can protect and defend itself against the threatened danger or secure to itself those benefits to which it is justly entitled as a part of the Nation. This question, like all others relating to social formulas, soon reduces itself to the simple question of reason and justice, and justice does not have one set of scales for the big things and another for the little things. The same law that causes the apple to fall to the ground keeps the stars in their places; the same simple principle of right that forbids the trespasses of neighbors forbids the trespasses of nations and forbids any State of this Union to encroach upon the natural and just rights of any other State. It is not the right to kill that is paramount. It is the right to the protection which the birds afford; it is the right to preserve the flora, the grain, vegetables, and fruits that is paramount.

The point of first importance in considering questions of this kind is the gravity and imminence of the danger threatened and the extent and nature of the benefit to be derived from the proposed legislation. No one questions the right of the Federal Government to quarantine its ports against the introduction of plagues and contagious diseases. No one questions the right of any State to protect its borders. The question as to whether the Nation and the State have concurrent jurisdiction or whether sole jurisdiction shall be given to the one or the other is the question of competency. If the State, by exerting its authority, can secure to its citizens the protection to which it is justly and fairly entitled, there will be no need of Federal interference except as it may be complementary and at the request and with the approval of the State, but if need for assistance is manifest, if the danger is real and general and it is not within the power of a single State to protect itself and secure the benefits and protection to which it is justly and fairly entitled, then there is, as it seems to me, no escape from the conclusion that the common defense and general welfare of the people must utterly fail unless the Nation can come to the rescue.

So, Mr. President, if it be true that the migratory birds of the Western Hemisphere are worth saving, and I shall assume that they are, is it not equally true that the State of Connecticut is incompetent and powerless to accomplish this result single handed? If it is true that the people of Connecticut are entitled to their share of the benefits resulting from the preservation of the migratory birds of the Western Hemisphere, I insist that however small that share may be the State of Connecticut is utterly incompetent and powerless to preserve and protect it. It must be clear that during six months of each year every one of these birds may be killed with impunity, the laws of the State of Connecticut to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. President, no State and no group of States can provide the remedy needed. The State is wholly incompetent. The Nation itself is competent to a degree only.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator, in view of the statement he has just made, why it would not be possible for the States individually to afford protection, if they should act in unison and in concert in regard to the matter—that is, if all of them should act upon the subject?

Mr. McLEAN. They have had the experience of a century and a quarter, I suppose, doing the best they could under the circumstances; but in the very nature of the case it is a matter that excites jealousies and retaliations. So far as the broad question is concerned, it is not a State matter; it is not a national matter; it is a continental question; it is a question for the Western Hemisphere to decide, as it seems to me.

Mr. BORAH. Have the States which have petitioned Congress for this action and which have spoken through their game wardens, and so forth, themselves made any effort to protect the situation? Have they laws upon the subject?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; nearly every State in the Union; and, as the Senator will see from some of the extracts which I have inserted in my remarks, the best efforts that can be made State wise have up to date proven utterly ineffective.

Mr. BORAH. The reason I asked that question——

Mr. McLEAN. State comity can not be exercised because the matter is one which would breed a spirit of retaliation. Each State is anxious to get the most it can, especially of the game birds. As I have told the Senate, in seven States of the Union the robin is to-day a game bird, and is killed by the tens of thousands. It is estimated that in Louisiana alone two years ago 50,000 robins were killed.

Mr. BORAH. Then, where is the law in Louisiana which prohibits that?

Mr. McLEAN. There is none.

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly what I wished to know. The State has not undertaken to do anything at all.

Mr. McLEAN. Only in regard to game birds, and they have a closed season for some of the song birds, but the State laws are like a crazy quilt.

Mr. BORAH. The reason I asked the question was because I have an abiding conviction that when we formed this Government there were no powers of government lost anywhere. A power rests either with the National Government or with the State governments. If the State governments have not the power and can not, in the exercise of the powers which they have, protect themselves in this respect, that is a strong argument, to my mind, why the National Government may have the power; there is a power somewhere. But I do not see that the States have taken any concerted action in regard to this matter at all, and it seems clear that they have the power, but have simply failed to use it.

Mr. McLEAN. None whatever, only to trespass upon each other and kill all the birds they can.

Mr. BORAH. On the other hand, I do not think that the Constitution of the United States can be construed in the light of the negligence of the States. Simply because the States neglect to use their reserved powers constitutes no reason why the National Government should assume to exercise unconstitutional powers. The very fact that the States decline to exercise a power may be an expression, as it were, of their desire that power be not used.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, when we give this question the consideration it deserves, we must see at once that it presents a problem far beyond that of State pride or State sovereignty. It calls for an exercise of authority as far removed from State legislation as Patagonia is distant from Alaska. It is not a State question—it is not a national question; it is a continental question. It does not involve the right of either State or Nation to destroy bird life. It is not the right to kill the robin; it is the right every State and nation has to enjoy its just share of the blessings of Providence—its natural resources. It is the duty of the United States to lead the way now; i. e., go as far as it can and start now, as it was the duty of Austria to lead the way for the European nations 40 years ago. Future generations will never forgive us if we delay this matter longer, and we will not deserve forgiveness if we delay longer. If this law is enacted we may hope and expect that the other nations of the Western Hemisphere will recognize the wisdom and necessity of following our lead, and either by treaty or law bear witness to the fact that American civilization has ceased to recognize the wanton destruction of one of its most beautiful and useful natural blessings and benefits as the right of any man or set of men.

The senior Senator from New York, in a recent address before the Pennsylvania Society, put this branch of the subject where I am quite willing to leave it for the present. In this address the distinguished Senator says:

> The instinct of self-government among the people of the United States is too strong to respect anyone's right to exercise a power which he fails to exercise. If the States fail to furnish it in due measure, sooner or later constructions of the Constitution will be found to vest the power where it will be exercised—in the National Government.

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand that the Senator from New York advocated that that could be done without an amendment to the Constitution; that the neglect of a State to act would give rise rightfully to a new interpretation or justify the construing into the Constitution of a new provision.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from New York did not say that.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from New York was not advocating anything except that the States should perform their duty. He was giving a warning to the States that if they did not perform their duties, if they did not exercise their powers, they might expect sooner or later to lose their powers. It was not advocacy; it was warning.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho understood the Senator from New York correctly. The Senator was not arguing that by reason of the failure of the States to do their duty the National Government could constitutionally assume the powers which had been reserved to the States.

Mr. ROOT. Certainly not.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, my point is that no single State is competent to furnish the protection that is necessary.

It is beyond the power of any State to do it, and there is no other way to secure this legislation, which will reach the general welfare, if we can believe anything that these gentlemen who have made a life study of this question tell us, than for the Federal Government to assume control; and we must expect that in due time we shall have a Pan-American agreement in regard to this matter, just as they have in Europe. I do not believe there will be any other way to effectively accomplish the protection of the insectivorous bird.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the administration of this proposed law.

ADMINISTRATION.

The administration of this law has been placed in the Department of Agriculture, with certain restrictions as to penalties and other conditions preventing interference with State regulations. This bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall establish certain zones dependent upon climatic conditions and the habits of the birds to be protected and make such regulations within these zones as the law directs.

I am myself opposed to the multiplication of administrative laws or the delegation of judicial powers to commissions unless the necessity is very clear. We have to-day scores of governmental agencies and bureaus clothed with judicial functions, some of them giving wide scope to the discretion of administrative officers. But it does not follow that a lack of caution in one case should demand unreasonable and unnecessary caution in another. Where Government officers and agents are clothed with full authority to seize and destroy private property to the end that the health, morals, and safety of the community may be conserved, injustice and hardship may occur unless the Government agency is of the highest order.

But again I call your attention to the fact that the bill under consideration in no way affects or imperils property or private rights. No harm can come to any citizen unless he destroys life in which he has no property right, and in every such case the constitutional rights of the accused, both as regards his arrest and trial, are left wholly undisturbed.

The only power delegated in this bill is the power to designate and bound the several zones. I am heartily in favor of leaving this matter to the Department of Agriculture, because there is every reason to believe that its officers will act with much more accurate information than can be had by a congressional committee. Indeed, if Congress should undertake to establish the zones provided for in this bill, its best source of information would be the ornithologists and experts in the Agricultural Department.

It is to be borne in mind that this bill is a beginning. Improvements upon the pending legislation will probably come with experience, but the bill as it stands can result in no harm to any human being or his possessions. It has more than an even chance, I think, of becoming one of the most beneficial and highly prized institutions of the country. If anyone is concerned about the expense which may be entailed in the operation of this law, I will call his attention to the fact that since 1903 Congress has appropriated $3,530,284, which has been expended by the Bureau of Entomology in its investigations of insects injurious or beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, and arboriculture:

Appropriations for the fiscal years 1903–1913.

1903.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	$45,500
1904.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	65,500
1905.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	70,000
	Cotton-boll weevil investigations (allotted to Bureau of Entomology)	80,000
1906.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	68,060
	Cotton-boll weevil investigations (allotted to Bureau of Entomology)	84,444
1907.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	75,000
	Prevent spread of moths	82,500
	Cotton-boll weevil investigations (allotted to Bureau of Entomology)	85,000
1908.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	113,809
	Preventing spread of moths	150,000
	Cotton-boll weevil investigations (allotted to Bureau of Entomology)	40,000
1909.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	158,800
	Preventing spread of moths	250,000
1910.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	198,400
	Preventing spread of moths	300,000
1911.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	202,900
	Preventing spread of moths	300,000
1912.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	256,950
	Preventing spread of moths	284,840
1913.	General expenses, Bureau of Entomology	328,750
	Preventing spread of moths	284,840
	Exterminating the army worm	5,000
	Total	3,530,284

If Congress can legitimately expend millions of dollars in ineffective and temporary efforts to protect the flora of the country from the ravages of insects, I can see neither economy nor statesmanship in a refusal to use agencies that promise permanent protection to a very considerable extent and at a very slight cost. If 10 per cent of the loss now caused annually by destructive insects can be prevented, it means an annual saving of $80,000,000 to the agricultural interests of the country, and this bill calls for but $10,000. And now, Mr. President, I conclude with a few sentences which will apply to this and several other matters now on the calendar.

Mr. REED. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question in regard to this subject?

Mr. McLEAN. Not at all.

Mr. REED. I desire to say, as a preliminary, that I am interested in the bill and believe that some action should be taken in the direction suggested. My question is, Under what clause of the Constitution does the Senator think we can exercise the right to prevent the killing of game?

Mr. McLEAN. I have presented my views with regard to that question.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was obliged to be out of the Chamber for awhile and did not hear him. I would not ask him to restate them.

Mr. McLEAN. I frankly said that I did not myself find authority for it in any express clause of the Constitution, but I thought it was one of the implied attributes of sovereignty, based upon the incompetency of any State to accomplish the results desired, and that it is absolutely necessary that any nation worthy of the name shall have this power; and I cited instances of treaties and conventions between European nations. They have there a very complete code for the protection of game birds, and my hope is that the nations of the Western Hemisphere will, when the United States sets the example, quickly follow it.

The Senator will admit that a great many things have been decided as constitutional for which our fathers, at least, found no special constitutional grant, and that is my position. I agree it is fallow ground, and I cited but one case in which the Supreme Court clearly intimated that it was a dormant right that the Nation has a right to exert any time it chooses.

Mr. REED. What I had in mind was this thought: The Federal Government is a Government of delegated powers, and possesses no powers whatsoever except those that are expressly delegated and those necessarily incident thereto. I should be glad if we could find ground upon which to protect migratory birds.

The Senator speaks of the sovereignties of Europe having, by conventions or mutual agreements, protected game birds. In that case each of these nations is a sovereign and possesses absolute power.

Mr. McLEAN. I hope the United States is or will be in due time.

Mr. REED. It possesses absolute power, whereas the United States is a sovereignty limited in its powers by the Constitution. England having the right to do as it pleases with birds——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I am very anxious to finish my remarks before 2 o'clock.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not know I was trenching upon his time, but if he will permit me to finish that sentence——

Mr. McLEAN. I am willing to yield for a question, but the discussion of this subject, I will admit, if thoroughly gone into by the constitutional experts of the Senate, would take more time than we shall have before 2 o'clock.

Mr. REED. I do not profess to be a constitutional expert. I simply wanted to get the Senator's view. I will take pleasure in reading the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. It is something the States can not do. The State of Connecticut can not protect the migratory birds of the Western Hemisphere; it is something no single State can do. Now, if the Nation has not the power to promote the general welfare in this regard, where the demand is insistent and imminent, all I have to say is that if I were a member of the Supreme Court of the United States I should not hesitate to say that the spirit of the Constitution should be read into its language to that extent.

There is at the present time an ever-increasing interest in and demand for the initiative and referendum. I do not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of these measures, but I think that a very important factor in the genesis of the demand for the initiative and referendum is the feeling among the people that the representative system fails to respond as quickly as it should to reasonable requests for remedial legislation.

I consider Senator Bailey's recent defense of our representative system of government one of the ablest ever made. I was charmed with its force and eloquence. But through it all there ran in my mind this question, If the system is without fault, why is it that so many honest and able men find fault with it? That there is a widespread dissatisfaction with the fruits of representative government no one can deny. If the system is sound, why does it fail to satisfy? Is it the violin or the violinist that causes the discord? Has the representative system failed or have we failed to understand how to apply it? Congress is the only place to which the people can come for remedial legislation affecting the general welfare. We speak and act for them by their direction and with their consent. We may hold with Burke that it is our judgment and not theirs that will best conserve the interests of the people. We may insist that we are chosen because of our superior knowledge and experience in legislative matters, and it is therefore our duty to resist the unwise demands of the people as a physician would resist the use of injurious drugs, although demanded by his patient. I know that the congressional machine is geared to run slowly, and that for the best of reasons. The 30,000 or more bills now pending in Congress present hundreds of thousands of questions. Many of these questions can not be answered in the affirmative; many of them ought not to be answered at all. The people understand this just as well as we do. They know that Congress is a mill to which chaff is brought in much larger quantities than grain, but they expect us to return to them the best that is possible under the circumstances. They do not want the mill to stop on account of the chaff. It is therefore my opinion that when a measure of great public interest has been carefully considered by a committee and reported back to this body with the recommendation that the measure be favorably acted upon it should be acted upon within a reasonable time.

I have no fault to find up to date with the lack of progress that has attended this bill. I have been a Member of the Senate nearly two years, and I have been profoundly impressed with the spirit of courtesy which governs its deliberations. I do not say that I have ever seen this spirit abused, but it is my belief that the people are not interested as much in this time-honored and chivalrous consideration of our individual importance as they are in securing wise and timely action upon the important measures pending.

So, Mr. President, I feel it my duty to say that I shall ask the Senate to fix a day some time this month in which at least we can agree upon a vote. I think this bill is entitled to a vote this session. It must be manifest that if the friends of this bill are right, the sooner we recognize the necessity of action the better; if the birds are worth saving, we had better save them before they are all destroyed.

I realize that it may be difficult to secure action upon this bill in both Houses this session, but if the Senate will consent to a vote upon this measure, if it gets the support I believe it will have, it may pass this body in time to pass the House; and so I give notice that on Wednesday of next week I will ask the Senate to take up this bill and consider it after the routine morning business, with the hope that at that time there may be an agreement reached for a vote some time during the month of January.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I ask permission out of order to introduce a resolution, and to it I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut in connection with his very interesting argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Wyoming in the chair). The Senator from New York presents a resolution, which will be read for information.

The resolution (S. Res. 428) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to propose to the governments of other North American countries the negotiation of a convention for the mutual protection and preservation of migratory birds.

Mr. ROOT. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. ROOT. I think, sir, that that may furnish a pathway along which we can proceed to some practical relief in regard to the very urgent and pressing evil which the Senator from Connecticut has described. We already have a treaty regarding migratory fish in the Great Lakes and in that system of waters, and it may be that under the treaty-making power a situation can be created in which the Government of the United States will have constitutional authority to deal with this subject. At all events, that is worthy of careful consideration, and for that purpose I open it by the offer of this resolution.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate joint resolution No. 78.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crane	McCumber	Shively
Bacon	Crawford	McLean	Simmons
Bankhead	Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Cummins	Newlands	Smoot
Bradley	Dillingham	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Bristow	Fletcher	Page	Sutherland
Bryan	Foster	Penrose	Swanson
Burnham	Gallinger	Perkins	Thornton
Burton	Gronna	Perky	Tillman
Catron	Heiskell	Pomerene	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Reed	Warren
Clapp	Jones	Richardson	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Root	Williams
Clarke, Ark.	Lodge	Sanders	Works

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate 60 Senators have responded to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], now in the chair, to the joint resolution under consideration is the pending question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, before the word "years" strike out "six" and insert "four," so as to read:

The term of the office of President shall be four years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment just read.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

OPINIONS OF SENATORS FILED AND PUBLISHED BY ORDER OF THE SENATE SITTING ON THE TRIAL OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD, CIRCUIT JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE THIRD JUDICIAL CIRCUIT, AND DESIGNATED TO SERVE IN THE COMMERCE COURT.

OPINION OF MR. WORKS.

Under the Constitution appointments to office are made "during good behavior." Necessarily, then, bad behavior forfeits the right to longer hold the office. There is but one way to legally terminate the office thus forfeited, namely, by impeachment. The cause of removal must be as broad as the act that forfeits the place. If good behavior is a condition upon which the holder of it is entitled to continue in the office, logically bad behavior affecting his conduct as a judge and the duties and proprieties of the office must be a ground of impeachment.

The claim is made here, and ably and earnestly maintained, that the respondent can be impeached only for high crimes and misdemeanors, and that the word "misdemeanor," as used in this connection, must be taken in its technical legal sense as describing a criminal offense less than a felony. The broader meaning of the word, as defined by lexicographers, is "ill behavior, evil conduct, a misdeed." To give it only the limited meaning contended for would render the Constitution, as it relates to the tenure of office, contradictory and illogical. In fixing the length of the term it is made to depend upon good behavior. In providing for the termination of the office, construed as contended for by counsel for the respondent, it could not be done for any bad behavior, however flagrant or however clearly it showed the holder of the office to be unfit for the place. Thus construed, the officer may commit every possible misdeed not amounting to a crime, and yet the Government be powerless to relieve itself of such an unworthy and unfit public servant. Certainly one sitting as judge in so grave a matter could not give such a construction to the Constitution unless forced to do so by its express and unambiguous terms. That is not so in this instance. In the one clause providing for the term of office the term "good behavior" is used, in the clause providing for impeachment the word "misdemeanor." The definition of misdemeanor in its broader and proper sense is just the opposite of good behavior. To give it this meaning makes the whole provision relating to the subject perfectly logical and harmonious. In my judgment no other construction can be given it without doing violence to the purpose and intent of its framers. Not only so, but the effect of such a construction is to continue in office a public servant who has clearly forfeited his right to the office by violating the condition upon which alone he is justly entitled to hold it, and would be wrong and unjust to the people whose servant he is.

Then the simple question is, Has the respondent been guilty of such bad behavior, evil conduct, or misdeeds relating to the conduct of his office and his duties as a judge as should deprive him of an office that he is entitled to hold only during good behavior?

Judged by the Constitution, as I am convinced it should be construed, I have no hesitation in saying that the respondent has been guilty of such misconduct as should forfeit his right to further hold his office, and that at least a part of the charges made against him by the House of Representatives are sufficient in law and sustained by the evidence, and that therefore the respondent should be impeached, and I shall vote accordingly.

I am of the opinion that the respondent can not be impeached for offenses committed before his appointment to his present office. The Constitution provides in express terms that judges appointed "shall hold their offices during good behavior." Therefore, if a judge has maintained his good behavior during that time, he has done nothing to forfeit his office. The condition upon which he is entitled to continue in office is good behavior during his service, not before. Conversely, it is only bad behavior during the same time that can forfeit the office or warrant his impeachment. Neither can such misbehavior committed before his appointment warrant a judgment disqualifying him from holding office, because such a judgment can be rendered only on his impeachment, which can not be had for such offenses. Such offenses might show his unfitness to hold office and properly prevent his appointment, but they can not be cause for his impeachment.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WILLIAM J. STONE.

I requested the Senate to excuse me, and the Senate did excuse me, from voting on articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12; and I desire now to state somewhat more fully than I could under the circumstances of the moment, and yet briefly, the reasons for this request. These particular articles of impeachment charge the respondent, Judge Archbald, with having committed certain acts, alleged to be official misbehavior, while he was serving as a district judge in Pennsylvania. He ceased to be a district judge long before these articles of impeachment were preferred or presented by the House of Representatives. I have grave doubt as to whether acts committed by an official while holding a given office can, after he ceases to hold that office, be made the basis of impeachment proceedings. As stated, Judge Archbald ceased to be a district judge long before the acts charged in these articles as misdemeanors were committed. I seriously doubt whether a man in the circumstances of this case can be impeached and removed from another wholly different office. If that course should be established as a fixed policy, I fear it might lead to gross abuses, and I feel that we ought to act with great deliberation, not only with respect to the moment but with respect to the future. It would not be difficult to conceive—having in view what has previously happened in our history—of a case, for instance, where one who had been a district judge had been appointed to the Supreme Bench of the United States, and who thereafter had served for years on that bench without committing any act that could by any possibility subject him to impeachment; yet, under great pressure, when the country was in a state of high political excitement, and when some supposed political exigency was influencing a partisan public opinion, a hostile partisan majority might hark back to some alleged misbehavior of the judge when he held the former minor judicial position and make that the basis of impeaching him. The same rule of practice, if once established, might well be invoked and applied to any other civil officer, including the President, who is subject to impeachment under the Constitution. I am conscious, of course, that plausible reasons may be given to support the contrary opinion, but being strongly inclined to the view above expressed I am unwilling by my vote to establish or sanction the precedent that a man may be impeached for alleged official misbehavior in an office he has long since ceased to hold and to use that as a basis for removing him from another official station in the discharge of the duties of which no complaint is made. I am all the more inclined to take that position on this hearing because of the fact that already the Senate has by a majority vote found this respondent guilty on several articles of impeachment charging him with misbehavior, high crimes, and misdemeanors in the office of which he is now the incumbent; and therefore, as I view it, there is no necessity of going further and giving the sanction of the Senate to a precedent that might be pregnant of danger in the future abuse of it.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR GRONNA RELATIVE TO HIS VOTE ON THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT AGAINST ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

Fully realizing the solemn responsibility resting upon me, I have felt compelled to vote to convict Judge Robert W. Archbald on all the charges against him except those contained in articles 6, 10, 11, and 13.

Article 6 charges him with having attempted to use his influence to induce the officers of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railway Co. to purchase an interest in a tract of coal land belonging to the Everhart heirs. Judge Archbald testified that he did nothing except what was necessary to protect the interests of the Everhart heirs. In my opinion, the evidence offered in support of the charge in this article is insufficient to sustain it.

Article 10 charges him with receiving, while a United States district judge, a sum of money from Mr. Henry W. Cannon, a director in various corporations, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a pleasure trip to Europe. It appears that Mr. Cannon is a first cousin of Judge Archbald's wife, and that he invited them to take a trip to Europe at his expense, which invitation they accepted. No corrupt intent has been shown either on the part of Mr. Cannon or of Judge Archbald; it has not been shown that Mr. Cannon was interested in any cases before Judge Archbald's court or that Judge Archbald had any reason to believe that any cases would come before his court in which Mr. Cannon would be interested. The near relationship of the parties would seem to offer a sufficient explanation of Mr. Cannon's act, and in the absence of a showing of anything from which a corrupt intent can fairly be presumed, I do not find that the act charged in this article, as proved, is an impeachable offense.

Article 11 charges Judge Archbald with accepting a purse of some $500 contributed by attorneys practicing before his court. It appears that the purse was made up by a large number of attorneys and that the envelope containing it was handed to Judge Archbald as he was embarking for Europe, with the request not to open it until he had been two days at sea. While of doubtful propriety, I do not find that the act proved was, under the circumstances, an impeachable offense.

Several of the acts charged in the articles were committed while Judge Archbald was a United States district judge. The defense has urged that as these acts were committed while he held a different office from the one held when impeached, he should not be placed on trial for these acts. While I realize that there is room for a difference of opinion on this question, I find that in the Belknap case the Senate held that an officer may be impeached and that the Senate will have jurisdiction to try the case even if the said officer resigned from his office prior to the impeachment and was not at the time of the impeachment and trial an officer of the United States. In this case it appears to me there is even stronger reason for asserting the jurisdiction of the Senate; while Judge Archbald was not at the time of the impeachment holding the identical office which he did when the offenses referred to were committed, the office is closely linked to the one he previously held, and the duties he was called on to perform were of the same general nature; his appointment as a circuit judge was in the nature of a promotion. If we were to hold that the Senate can not take jurisdiction over offenses committed while he was a district judge, we should, it seems to me, adopt a rule which, if followed in future cases, might make it impossible to secure the removal of a totally unfit officer if he succeeded in obtaining an appointment to another office before the facts of the offenses which he had committed became generally known. It seems to me that where the Senate has the sole power to try public officers for high crimes and misdemeanors committed by them, it must of necessity assert its jurisdiction at least so long as such officers remain in the public service.

On article 13 I asked to be excused from voting because it is, as I understand it, a repetition of the charges contained in all the preceding articles, on some of which I voted to acquit. In my opinion this article is unnecessary, as all the charges in it had previously been separately submitted to the Senate.

OPINION OF MR. CRAWFORD.

The following facts alleged in the articles of impeachment are admitted by respondent in his answer. They are not in controversy. That is to say, it is established without conflict of testimony that at a time when he was serving in the Commerce Court as a circuit judge of the United States and at a time when the Erie Railroad Co. was a real party in interest in two suits pending and undetermined in that court, the respondent and one Edward J. Williams, for the purpose of making a profit of two or three thousand dollars each, agreed to cooperate in securing an option to purchase the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary corporation of the Erie Railroad Co.—together with the interest of one John W. Robertson—in a certain culm dump near Moosic, Pa., known as the Katydid dump; that the particular service to be rendered by the respondent in this undertaking was to secure the option from the Hillside Co.; and by telephone and letters he made his desire known to the superintendent of the company at Scranton, and not being successful there, called at the offices of the general counsel of the Erie Railroad Co.—who was also general counsel for the Hillside Co.—in the city of New York, when he was there holding a term of court as a judge of the circuit court of the United States, and made his desire to secure the option to purchase this dump known to the general counsel; also, on the same day, to Mr. Richardson, one of the vice presidents of the Hillside Co. As a result of his efforts the Hillside Co., which before that time had refused to deal with Williams, gave to him a written proposal to sell its interest in the Katydid dump for the sum of $4,500; all this occurred while these important suits in which the Erie Railroad Co. was a party in interest were pending and undetermined in the Court of Commerce; the respondent had a joint pecuniary interest in this venture with Williams. In my judgment this was misconduct in office and a high misdemeanor.

Respondent also admits that while a certain suit, in which the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a real party in interest, was pending in the Court of Commerce, and while the respondent was serving as a member of that court, and while certain other important cases in which that railroad company was a party in interest and a defendant, and in which the Marian Coal Co., of which Christopher G. Boland and his brothers owned a two-thirds interest, was complainant, were pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission—cases in which the defendant was charged with unjust discriminations and excessive transportation charges—the decision of the commission being subject to review in the Commerce Court, Boland and his brother employed an intimate friend of respondent, an attorney named Watson, who was not their attorney of record in these suits, to make a settlement of the differences in litigation between the Marian Coal Co. and the Lackawanna Railroad Co. and to effect a sale of the property of the former to the latter company, for which services, if successful, Watson was to receive the sum of $5,000; that at the request of Watson, and with the knowledge and consent of the Bolands, the respondent agreed to cooperate with and aid Watson in making this settlement, and in carrying out the joint undertaking he had interviews with Mr. Loomis, vice president of the Lackawanna Co.; wrote him letters about the matter; suggested offering his services direct; recommended a personal conference between Watson and Loomis and Mr. Truesdale, president of the company, remarking that "there is nothing like a personal interview to bring about such a result." He admits that after repeated efforts made by himself and Watson had failed of results Watson met him by appointment in Washington, where the respondent gave Watson a copy of the petition in the Meaker case, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission had made a decision materially affecting one of the questions involved in the suit between the Marian Coal Co. and the Delaware & Lackawanna Railroad Co.; and several days after giving a copy of this petition to Watson, respondent had another interview with Mr. Loomis, of the Lackawanna Co., and urged him to make a settlement with the Bolands. Both Watson and Boland, when urging respondent to assist in effecting this settlement, knew of these suits in the Commerce Court and before the Interstate Commerce Commission; and respondent, when cooperating with them to effect the common result they were all working to bring about, knew that in case of a successful outcome his friend Watson would receive the sum of $5,000. I think this was misconduct in office and a high misdemeanor.

The respondent has also admitted that while he was a judge of the Circuit Court of the United States and acting as a judge of the Commerce Court, and during a period when the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. was a real party in interest in certain suits pending and undetermined in the Commerce Court, he secured, by personal solicitation from the Lehigh Coal Co.—owned by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.—an agreement by which the Lehigh Coal Co. undertook to surrender to him all its rights as lessee for the unexpired term of two years in a lease it held—from a trustee under the will of Stephen Girard, deceased—of a valuable culm dump known as Packer No. 3, near Shenandoah, Pa., owned by the city of Philadelphia, the trustee. This, in my judgment, was misconduct in office and a high misdemeanor.

He also admits that while he was acting as a judge of the Commerce Court the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. brought to that court a suit in which it sought to reverse or annul an order made against it by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and that after this case had been orally argued by counsel for both parties and after the record and briefs and arguments of counsel for both parties had been submitted to the court, respondent, without the knowledge or consent of the court, or of any other member of it, and without the knowledge or consent of opposing counsel or notice to them, wrote letters to Mr. Bruce, of Louisville, Ky., a lawyer who appeared in the case as counsel for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. In one of these letters he asked Mr. Bruce to confer with Mr. Compton, one of the officers of the railway company, who was one of its material witnesses in the case, and ascertain if he had not intended to say, "We did not apply it there," instead of saying what the record of the case reported him as saying, "We did apply it there," in testimony concerning the application of a certain combination rate; that Mr. Bruce complied with the request, saw Mr. Compton, and by a letter addressed to respondent stated that Compton meant to say, "We did not apply it there." Respondent inserted this letter in the record of the case in the Commerce Court without notice to the opposing party. In another of these letters he explained to Mr. Bruce that one of the members of the court had discovered certain evidence in the record which it was claimed refuted the argument of Mr. Bruce and sustained the commission, and invited Mr. Bruce to send in further argument to meet this claim. He admits that he received from Mr. Bruce in reply a long letter containing a statement of the contention of the railroad company and that the receipt of this letter and its contents were not disclosed by him to counsel on the other side nor to the other members of the court.

It is admitted also that after receiving these letters from Mr. Bruce and without further hearing or notice to opposing counsel the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. was reversed by the Commerce Court. In my judgment this was official misconduct and a high misdemeanor.

He has also admitted that while he was acting as a judge of the Commerce Court and while the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Co. sustained an intimate relation to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., the Reading Railroad Co. being a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, he solicited an interview with W. J. Richards, general manager of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. and sought to induce Richards to recognize his friend, one Warnke, as the assignee of a certain lease executed by the coal and iron company to other parties, or in lieu thereof to give to Warnke a lease of what was known as the Lincoln culm dump, belonging to the company, and that he had such an interview in the last of November, 1911. He also admits that in December, 1911, this same friend Warnke, as a member of a company known as the Premier Coal Co., had some transactions with the seller of a culm bank known as the old gravity fill, which was purchased by the Premier Coal Co. from the Lacoe & Shiffer Coal Co.; that neither Warnke nor his associates as purchasers understood that they were to pay a commission on the sale, but after they had made the purchase Warnke indorsed a note made by the Plymouth Co. to the respondent for $510, which was delivered to him and which he cashed at a bank. I decide that this is misconduct and a high misdemeanor.

He has also admitted that during the period from September 1, 1908, to the 1st of December, 1908, while he was judge of the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, which office he continued to hold until commissioned as an additional judge of the circuit court of the United States, litigation was pending in that court between the Old Plymouth Coal Co., in which one Rissinger and his brother owned a controlling interest, and certain insurance companies, involving about $28,000; and that in September, 1908, negotiations began between himself, Rissinger, and others in connection with a mining scheme in Honduras and were still pending when these cases came on for trial before him in November, 1908; that he denied a motion for nonsuit entered by the counsel for the insurance companies, after which ruling an agreement for settlement was made by the parties and consent judgments entered in favor of the plaintiffs, to be released on payment of the agreed amounts within 15 days after November 23, 1908. He also admits that on or about November 28 he indorsed Rissinger's note for $2,500, which was discounted by a bank in Scranton, and that in February, 1909, he received from Rissinger certificates representing stock issued to him in a corporation organized by Rissinger and others for the purpose of operating a gold placer mine in Honduras, for which he paid no consideration.

In this I find respondent guilty of misconduct, but it occurred before he became the incumbent of his present office. He had ceased to be a district judge when this charge was filed; and while he was guilty of misconduct, I do not believe impeachment can be sustained on this article for the reason stated.

He also admits that in 1909, while he was district judge of the middle district, a suit was pending before him for a large sum of money against the Marian Coal Co., owned by Christopher G. Boland and his brothers; that while this suit was pending and undetermined, he prepared a promissory note, payable to himself or order for $500, which was signed by one John Henry Jones, of Scranton; that respondent then indorsed the note and gave it to Jones; that he was afterwards told by Jones that this note might be presented to Christopher G. Boland for discount, and that he made no objections; that he also had a conversation with Charles H. Von Storch, president of the Providence Bank of Scranton, in regard to this note, and told him that he had indorsed it; that Von Storch was an attorney at law in practice in Scranton, and that nearly a year before this time, as judge of the circuit court, the respondent had decided a suit, in which Von Storch was a party defendant, in his favor; that the Providence Bank, of which Von Storch was president, discounted the note, which is still unpaid, except that $25 has been paid upon it by Jones.

I find respondent guilty of misconduct, but because it occurred before he became the incumbent of his present office, I do not believe the law would sustain an impeachment on this particular charge.

He also admits that in 1910 while he was a judge of the district court of the United States, and knew that Henry W. Cannon was a director in the Great Northern Railway Co. and president of a steamship company and engaged, among other things, in the mining of coal, and that Mr. Cannon was a full cousin of his wife; with knowledge of these facts, he and his wife became the guests of Mr. Cannon, and at his expense accompanied him for the period of about three months on a trip to Europe, including a visit to Mr. Cannon's villa in Florence, Italy. While I do not find that this act—after the explanation given—was misconduct, it does appear that at the time of his departure on this trip to Europe he received and accepted the sum of $525 from some of the attorneys and practitioners of the court over which he presided as judge; that at the time Edward R. W. Searle was clerk and J. B. Woodward was jury commissioner of the court, and both had been appointed by him, and that Searle collected these donations. I think the acceptance of this money was misconduct in office. Because it occurred before he entered upon his duties as a circuit judge, it can not, in my opinion, sustain an impeachment.

He also admits the appointment of J. B. Woodward as jury commissioner, and that Woodward was and is a general attorney for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; but respondent says he did not know that fact at the time he appointed him and first learned it several years afterwards. He admits, however, that Woodward, with his permission, continued to act as jury commissioner during all the time respondent was judge of the middle district, during all of which time he was general attorney for the railroad company. This was official misconduct, but it occurred before he became the incumbent of the office of circuit judge, and because of that fact alone, in my judgment, it does not sustain impeachment.

In addition to these admitted facts, the evidence submitted to the Senate shows clearly that the respondent entered into business relations with E. J. Williams and John Henry Jones, which not only tended to injure his own personal standing as a man, but tended to bring the court in which he was a public officer of the Government of the United States into disrepute. Both Williams and Jones were insolvents, without credit. Their appearance here as witnesses did not create a favorable impression. Williams, according to the testimony, boasted that Judge Archbald would tell him most anything. He advised John Henry Jones to request Boland to discount the $500 note, executed by Jones and indorsed by Archbald, and told Boland he made a mistake in not doing so, because the Peale case was pending in the United States court and he would have saved all the costs if he had discounted that note. Williams received letters from the respondent introducing him to Mr. Conn, vice president of what was known as the Laurel Line Co., and made offers on behalf of Williams and himself to sell the Katydid culm dump to Mr. Conn. Respondent also wrote letters to Capt. May, of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and had personal interviews with May in reference to transactions in which he invited May to deal with Williams as his business associate. He knew the kind of man Williams was. He knew the kind of man John Henry Jones was. Nevertheless the undisputed evidence shows that he allowed his name to be connected with theirs as maker and indorser of promissory notes which were peddled about the streets of Scranton and presented for discount to parties having suits pending and undetermined in the court over which respondent presided as judge. He allowed the world to know that he was willing to maintain business relations with a man like Williams, who, without notice to him, executed an agreement assigning an interest in the options on the Katydid dump to William P. Boland, referring to respondent as "a silent party" in the transaction; business relations with a man who boasted to others of the privileges he had with a Federal judge, and that Judge Archbald could get properties along the lines of the anthracite coal-carrying roads for him; "that he (respondent) had influence with the railroads" (442, 443); business relations with a man who claimed to others that at the time he and respondent were in the joint undertaking to secure an option on the Katydid dump the respondent explained to him the nature of the Lighterage cases pending in the Court of Commerce in which the Erie Railroad was a party, and said he would go to New York and see Mr. Brownell, the general counsel for the Erie, about getting the option; "that he might do him some injury for refusing such a small favor" (166). It is not proven that respondent made these statements, but it is beyond dispute that he maintained business relations with the man and invited others to deal with the man who says he made them and who told other people that he made them.

The undisputed testimony shows further that during the time respondent and Watson were engaged in the prosecution of the joint undertaking to settle the differences between the Marian Coal & Iron Co. and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. Watson, in explaining to Christopher G. Boland the reason why he demanded that the Lackawanna Co. pay the Marian Co. more than the $100,000 which had been named by the Bolands, said it was because the respondent "would be very influential in bringing this sale about, and he intended to have him compensated for it" (p. 721).

The undisputed testimony also shows that while both Rissinger and Judge Archbald resided in Scranton, where the $2,500 note executed by Rissinger and indorsed by Archbald in the Honduras mining scheme was made and delivered, Rissinger took that note to Wilkes-Barre during the period between the entering of the judgments against the insurance companies and the expiration of the 15-day stay, and requested his attorney in those cases—Mr. Lanahan, a resident of Wilkes-Barre—to discount it. Mr. Lanahan declined, and made the pertinent inquiry of Rissinger, "Why he should come to Wilkes-Barre, a strange town to him, and not get his note discounted in his own town" (p. 730).

These facts are established beyond controversy, and they convince me beyond any reasonable doubt that the behavior of the respondent as a judge of the district and circuit courts of the United States was not that "good behavior" contemplated by section 1 of Article III of the Constitution; but that on the contrary they show a course of conduct in office which is so clearly reckless and improper that it amounted, to say the least, to misbehavior. The tenure of his office depends entirely upon good behavior, and when that is shown to be wanting respondent's right to hold this high judicial position ends. The only tribunal clothed with the power to hear and determine whether his official tenure shall cease because of misbehavior is the Senate of these United States sitting as a court of impeachment. Section 3 of Article I declaring that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments, section 4 of Article II declaring that the President and Vice President and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, and section 1 of Article III declaring that the judges shall hold their offices during good behavior, are each and all entitled to equal consideration in determining the question before this Senate. The acts of the respondent, which I have just enumerated, while not defined by any express law of Congress as crimes, are in their essence and nature public offenses as serious—indeed, more serious—than many other official delinquencies which Congress has declared to be indictable as crimes. The act approved March 3, 1911, prohibits Federal judges from engaging in the practice of law and from accepting employment as counsel, and declares the violation of the act to be a "high" misdemeanor. (36 Rev. Stat., 1161.)

Is it any more of a public offense for a judge to accept employment as counsel or to engage in practice than it is for him to solicit options to buy property from litigants who have causes pending and undetermined in the court of which he is a member, or to give his opinion concerning the title to a culm dump to aid a sale from which he is to receive a commission or other pecuniary compensation? If the offense described in the act of March 3, 1911, is a high misdemeanor, certainly these acts of the respondent are offenses in the same class and may be designated as high misdemeanors.

The act of Congress approved March 4, 1909, makes it an indictable offense for an agent, having any direct or indirect interest in the pecuniary profits or contracts of any corporation, to be employed by or to act as an officer or agent for the United States in the transaction of any business with such corporation. If it is a public offense for an agent to act as a servant of the Government when his relation to a party dealing with him as the Government's official representative is such as to tempt him to do a wrong or to violate the trust imposed in him by the Government, is it any the less a public offense for a judge, at a time when parties have large interests pending and undecided in his court, to solicit from one of them substantial favors from which he or his friend expects to realize a pecuniary profit?

It seems to me it would come far short of meeting the fair intendment of these provisions of the Constitution if we were to regard as sufficient grounds for impeachment only the committing of indictable offenses by the judge and disregard all others. To such a construction I can not agree. It is for the Senate alone to say how it shall construe the words "other high crimes and misdemeanors"; and it is sufficient to define "misdemeanor" as the lexicographers define it in our dictionaries, where it is given as a synonym for "misbehavior."

The purposes of this trial do not relate to the penalties of some criminal statute; they are to ascertain whether there is sufficient cause for removing this judge from his office. The fact that he fills a high position in the Government and that acts of misbehavior done by him are followed by consequences far more injurious than could possibly follow such acts if done by a person in private life—injuries to the State, justifying so solemn an inquest as the one in which we have been engaged—this, and this alone, distinguishes the offense and brings it within that class known to the fathers as a "high misdemeanor." I am convinced that the respondent is guilty of misbehavior in office belonging to that class of offenses. I therefore find him guilty as charged in the thirteenth article.

OPINION OF MR. OLIVER.

I voted not guilty as to each of the articles of impeachment in the Archbald case for the following reasons:

The only charges which, in my opinion, were at all worthy of consideration were those which charged that the respondent used his influence with certain officials to secure favors for himself or his friends. As to these articles I am satisfied by the evidence that in none of the transactions referred to did Judge Archbald intend that the officials with whom he was dealing should be induced to grant favors either to him or others on account of his judicial position, nor do I think that the evidence establishes the fact that any such officials were in fact so influenced.

I followed the evidence in this case closely. I heard most of it and carefully read that which I did not hear. In my opinion the evidence utterly failed to disclose any corrupt intent on the part of Judge Archbald, and in the absence of such intent I could not see how I could vote to visit upon him the extreme penalties involved in impeachment.

GEORGE T. OLIVER.

OPINION OF MR. M'CUMBER.

Mr. President, pursuant to the resolution of the Senate authorizing any Senator to file within two days his reasons for any vote upon the several articles of impeachment in the case of the United States against Robert W. Archbald, I herewith present and ask to be filed as a part of the proceedings in said case the following:

The said articles of impeachment charged the said Robert W. Archbald in a number of counts with having corruptly used his influence as judge in securing and assisting to secure the sale and transfer of properties owned directly or indirectly by those who had litigation before his court and in attempting to influence parties litigant to settle such cases for the accommodation of his friends.

The general character of these offenses is illustrated in the charge contained in article 1, in which it is claimed that the said judge did induce and influence the officers of a railroad company and a coal company to enter into an agreement to sell a certain coal dump to said judge and another interested with him in its purchase; that he applied to the officers of said company to make such sale; and that at the time of the negotiations for sale the said companies were parties to an action pending in his court.

Judge Archbald admits the facts, but denies the wrongful or unlawful inference charged. The evidence does not satisfy me either that he intended to do an injustice in any of the many acts charged or that he actually influenced litigants to favor him in any way, or that his judicial acts were in any way influenced or affected by the refusal or the granting of any request made by him.

I hold, however, that such acts on the part of the judge of a court were extremely improper; that while they may not have been done with any wrongful purpose, the fact that any person or company had an action pending before his court upon which he might pass judgment might very naturally influence such person or corporation to accede to his request for a favor or his importunities for the sale of property. Every layman knows, and certainly every judge should know, the natural impulse of the human mind to yield favor for favor, benefit for benefit, and often to expect it; and he should equally understand the natural fear to incur the displeasure of one whose power might be exercised to injure.

Such acts were further exceedingly improper because they subjected the court to suspicion and criticism and tended to diminish the faith, respect, and credit that ought to be accorded by the public to all judicial acts.

Had I been compelled to vote directly upon the question, first, whether Judge Archbald had intentionally used his official position for the purpose of securing an undue advantage, or, second, whether he had secured any undue advantage because of his official position in any business matter, I should have been compelled to have voted that the charges had not been established by the evidence.

My vote of guilty upon any article on which such vote was recorded was a vote that Judge Archbald had been guilty of judicial impropriety or misbehavior, and not a vote that such impropriety or misbehavior had improperly influenced either the acts of litigants or his own judicial acts.

The question which then presented itself to my mind was whether official misconduct in order to be an impeachable offense must be of such nature and of such gravity as to constitute an indictable offense or one which could be punished under indictment or other criminal process.

Section 4 of Article II of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The words, "other high crimes and misdemeanors," in my opinion were intended to mean others of like gravity.

I am aware that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution the practice in the British Parliament did not limit the offenses for which impeachment was had, either to those of the gravity indicated in section 4 of Article II of the Constitution, or to those which were indictable or punishable under the common law. But in the absence of any parliamentary statute defining the offenses for which impeachment would lie, I am of the opinion that in adopting that portion of the Constitution the framers did not adopt or seek to adopt a construction upon it to conform to British precedents. Applying the ordinary rules of construction to the words "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," as they appear in said section 4, standing alone, I could hardly bring myself to believe that they were intended to mean merely improper or reprehensible conduct.

But, further on in the Constitution, in section 1, Article III, we find the following provision:

> The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

Who is to determine what is good behavior and in what forum is that determination to be had? The Constitution provides no method of removal from office except through the process of impeachment. As impeachment is the only process by which removal can be had, and as a judge is entitled to hold his office only during good behavior, it necessarily follows, it seems to me, that an impeachment must lie against a judge for an act which constitutes bad behavior, and therefore, taking the Constitution as a whole and giving effect to both section 4 of Article II and section 1 of Article III of the Constitution, that at least so far as the judges of our courts are concerned the provisions of section 4 of Article II are made applicable to acts of judicial misbehavior, even though such acts are not subject to punishment under indictment or criminal process.

Turning, now, to the several articles of impeachment, I found that the charges contained in articles 1, 3, 5, and 6 were established either by admissions or by testimony, and holding, as I do, that criminal or corrupt intent on the part of Judge Archbald is unnecessary to establish an impeachable offense, I voted "guilty" on said articles.

I hold that the charges contained in articles 2 and 4 were not established by the evidence, or at least that no grave offense was so established, and voted "not guilty" on those articles.

Articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 charge offenses committed while Judge Archbald was judge of the United States District Court for the Middle District of the State of Pennsylvania. They charge offenses committed while Judge Archbald was holding another and distinct official position.

I hold that the purpose of the Constitution in providing for impeachment proceedings was to purge the official roll of the courts of improper officers and nothing further. The Constitution therefore provided that the judgment of the Senate should not go beyond removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. Its purpose was not to inflict punishment, except in so far as such punishment was necessary to accomplish its legitimate end, and therefore impeachment proceedings can not lie against a person for an act committed while holding an official position from which he is separated. Of course, if jurisdiction had been obtained of the case while the respondent was holding the position, resignation by him could not operate to divest the jurisdiction. The jurisdiction to enter judgment of disqualification would continue. I therefore voted "not guilty" on each and all of said articles, 7 to 12, inclusive. It is but proper, however, for me to state that, independent of the legal proposition, I should have been compelled to have voted "not guilty" on some of them, either because the charge did not constitute judicial misbehavior or that such charge was not established. This is especially true as to articles 8, 10, 11, and 12.

Article 13 generalizes and includes all of the specific charges contained in articles 1 to 12, inclusive. I voted "guilty" upon said article 13, but in doing so my vote was intended to express my conviction only as to those specific charges included in article 13 upon which I had already voted "guilty."

More than two-thirds of the Senate having voted the respondent guilty on a number of charges, the Constitution makes it incumbent upon the Senate to enter judgment of removal from office, and I therefore with deepest regret voted to carry that judgment into effect.

I voted against that portion of the order for judgment which disqualified the respondent from holding any official position of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, because this seemed to me to be unnecessary and excessive punishment for the offense. The punishment of removal from office I regard as extremely harsh and excessive for the offenses established by the evidence, and I sincerely wish that a lighter one could have been imposed under the Constitution.

OPINION OF MR. CATRON.

It is my judgment that none of the charges are proper, because they do not charge either treason, bribery, or any other high crime or misdemeanor against the respondent.

Section 4 of Article II of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It is an invariable rule of construction that where a statute makes acts punishable and in defining the acts selects certain ones by specific designation and provides for all others, as in this case, "or other high crimes and misdemeanors," that the acts or cases embraced under the word "other" high crimes and misdemeanors must be of a similar class to that of those actually mentioned; that is to say, they must be a genus of the same species. The words "other high crimes" can not be construed to mean other crimes than felonies, the two previously mentioned being felonies, and the word "misdemeanors," used in that section, must mean a crime of a lower order of punishment, but it can not mean anything but a crime; it can not mean a mere misbehavior or neglect of duty unless these things are made crimes. This is the universal construction of such statutes unless there be something in the statute which indicates that a different construction was intended; but there is nothing in the section showing that a different construction is intended; on the contrary, the entire context of that section, and of the remainder of the Constitution, indicates that such was the construction which was intended. It is, however, contended that the provision in Article III of the Constitution, which says—meant and intended that the want of good behavior should be deemed proper ground for removal under impeachment; but the want of good behavior is not necessarily a crime; nor can one tell what character of misbehavior would be offensive to section 4 of Article III if that was to be embraced within it. No man, let him be judge or otherwise, always conforms to what may be good behavior. As long as mankind are fallible they are liable to depart sometimes from the strict line of absolute "good behavior." It is said that there would be no other way to get rid of a judge who is guilty of misbehavior. There may not be under the Constitution alone, and there may not be because no law has been passed to provide for the removal of a judge for the want of good behavior.

In the enumeration in the Constitution of the powers of Congress the eighteenth clause thereof provides:

> That Congress shall have the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Under this clause the Congress of the United States can enact a law providing that a judge's office shall terminate on account of the want of good behavior and how that shall be determined.

The Congress of the United States has to a certain extent acted under that section. They have provided that judges of the United States courts may be retired from office after they have served a certain length of time and reached a certain age. If the provision of the Constitution which provides that judges shall hold their office during good behavior is to be taken literally, Congress has no power to authorize them to be retired on reaching 70 years of age, after having served 10 years on the bench. But the Constitution, in effect, provides that when a judge is guilty of misbehavior he shall not or may not hold his office any longer. How is that to be determined? Can not Congress, under the clause last quoted, provide by an act some other manner of determining the misbehavior of the judge or the want of good behavior in him? And when that is done the Executive can declare his office terminated and appoint his successor. It is claimed by some Senators that if a judge became insane or incapacitated to perform the duties of his office that he might be impeached and put out of the office, and that that would be the only way to get him out. There are many ways that could be provided for. A statute could be enacted to retire him, as a matter of course, upon such being determined by some competent authority, or even if he was not able to perform the duties of his office the statute might provide for an additional judge in the district where such judge presided, just as it does now provide that the judges of the Supreme Court may be retired upon full pay, at their option, and another judge appointed to fill their place.

Not believing that it is competent to impeach a judge for anything except a felony or a misdemeanor, both of which constitute a crime of a greater or less degree, I can not give my assent to finding the respondent guilty of something which I believe is improperly charged against him. This applies to all of the charges, as in my conception no crime or misdemeanor of any kind has been charged against Judge Archbald.

The charges—Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12—against Judge Archbald of acts committed during the time that he was district judge and before he became a circuit judge, in my opinion, have no validity in them.

Section 4 of Article II of the Constitution is restricted by the terms of that section to the actual President, Vice President, or any civil officer who is actually such at the time the charges are made, and in my judgment is limited to the acts done by him in that particular office. Judge Archbald, when these charges were preferred against him, had long ceased to be a district judge of the United States, and in my opinion when he was promoted to the office of circuit judge, if he had done anything wrong, all such offenses, whatever they might be, either criminal or amounting to a misbehavior only, had been condoned. The President is supposed to have looked into the private, official, and judicial character of Judge Archbald when he appointed him. In addition to that, his nomination was sent to the United States Senate, and a committee of the Senate took the same under advisement and is supposed to have looked into the character and standing of Judge Archbald and reported to the Senate on the subject. The Senate is supposed to have been satisfied thereon and to have adopted the recommendations of that committee. I do not believe that the House of Representatives had the right to go back of the present office held by Judge Archbald, to hunt up any of his acts to charge against him, so as to remove him from the office he now holds.

In addition to the foregoing reasons, I have made a careful study of the evidence, and I can not find anything outside of a mere, remote supposition, to be surmised from the facts, that Judge Archbald ever used his official position to accomplish anything which he is charged with having accomplished or attempted to accomplish. There is no proof that he alluded to himself in any way or held himself out in any way as a judge when he was attempting to get the options on the coal dumps or make any of the deals which are mentioned in the charges. It would take a stretch of imagination, in my judgment, to connect Judge Archbald's purpose to use his official position in the cases which he is charged with doing, so as to influence the other parties. It may be possible that the parties dealing with Judge Archbald may have been influenced by his official position, and it may be possible, as was stated by some of the witnesses, in substance, that his character was supposed to have some influence. There is no showing that Judge Archbald did anything further in any of those cases than to use his own personality, and did not call upon his judicial position in any respect. It would seem very strange in the number of acts which are charged against him as using his official position—and all of them charge that—that nowhere did he mention or insinuate that he as judge of the court desired the accomplishment of any of those acts, and I can not give my assent to the fact that we can draw upon our imagination sufficiently to connect the actions of Judge Archbald with an intentional and corrupt disposition to make use of his judicial position to favor his dealings. The charges are that he intentionally, corruptly, and improperly used his judicial position to accomplish those acts, and there is not a scintilla of proof to establish the same. There is a single charge against Judge Archbald in his capacity as a judge, and that is the one which charges him with writing to a lawyer in the Louisville & Nashville case, asking him to interview a witness and get the construction of the testimony that witness had given in the case. As I understand it, the witness in that case before Judge Archbald used language which, if taken alone, meant one thing, but when taken in connection with the other language used evidently showed that there was a mistake in the use of the language of the witness first used, and that the language as shown by the whole of the testimony of that witness was the way Judge Archbald considered it, even before and after the witness had given his version as to what he meant by his testimony. It may be that it was imprudent and impolitic for Judge Archbald to write such letter without interviewing the attorneys on the other side, but if it was a mere imprudence of irregularity did it amount to a crime, or did it amount to such character that Judge Archbald should be held to be corrupt and debased and not fit to hold the office of a judge? It seems that the court reversed itself by changing from its first conclusion, reached before judgment was entered, and taking the opposite ground, favored by Judge Archbald. It may be that this action of Judge Archbald brought about that result, but it was a correct result and an honest result, and Judge Archbald is charged with an offense for getting at the correct and honest facts and conclusion. Although he did it in an irregular and impolitic way, was there anything corruptly wrong or radically wrong in the suggestion to the attorney to send him further authorities on the subject? I do not believe that there is a lawyer in the land that does not, one time or another, without consulting the opposite side, furnish additional authorities to a judge having a case under advisement. It is irregular on the part of the lawyer to do that, and it is irregular on the part of the judge to receive it; yet it is often done. No complaint can be made against it when the opinion reached is a correct opinion and gives the correct results. That is all that can be made out in that case. It is one of those things that was an impropriety. It was not good legal ethics, but, yet, it was not of the character or condition to make the acts of Judge Archbald absolutely vicious, corrupt, and vile, sufficiently so to turn him out of the office and disqualify him forever from holding it.

I do not believe that the evidence establishes that Judge Archbald used his official position corruptly or illegally to accomplish any of the objects which are charged to have been accomplished by him, or attempted to be accomplished by him, and for that reason my opinion is that he is not guilty.

I believe that the guilt of the person accused must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis, and I do not believe that the evidence in this case established anything as to Judge Archbald's methods, either official or otherwise, that made his acts vicious or corrupt or of a criminal character, to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 14, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy blessing be upon us, O God, our heavenly Father, as we pass through the remaining hours of this day. As Thou hast reposed confidence in us, so may we put our confidence in Thee and in our fellow men, shunning the evil, holding fast to the good, doing faithfully and conscientiously the work Thou hast given us to do, leaving the results to infinite wisdom, power, and goodness; and glory and honor and praise be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF PEACE (H. DOC. NO. 1203).

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago there appeared in The Outlook an article by HENRY CABOT LODGE, entitled "One Hundred Years of Peace." It is a contribution of so much historical interest that I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] asks unanimous consent to print as a House document a certain speech on One Hundred Years of Peace, delivered by the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 27148, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 27148, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the House adjourned last evening an amendment was pending, proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG]. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Insert as a new paragraph on page 23, after line 20, the following:

"The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to admit to the mails and forward to the delivery office return-reply envelopes and post cards without stamps affixed. Each of said envelopes and cards shall bear upon its face a printed address, a permit number, and the statement 'Postage prepaid; no stamp required,' and that it shall be unmailable if address is altered. All such return-reply matter shall be delivered to the addressee at the delivery post office upon the payment of postage at the rate required by law. The Postmaster General shall require a sum in money or stamps to be deposited in such amounts and at such post offices as he may designate to secure the payment of postage on any and all such return-reply matter received for delivery. In the event of default in payment by the addressee of such postage, the postmaster at the delivery post office shall deduct the amount thereof from the money or postage stamps so deposited and deliver all such mail to the depositor.

"The Postmaster General shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry immediately into effect the foregoing provision."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to reserve his point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will for awhile.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves the point of order by unanimous consent.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I might say that there is no question but that the amendment is subject to a point of order. Under existing law those who desire to advertise their wares or merchandise or anything else of a legitimate character are permitted to send through the mails post cards which are mailed as a rule for the purpose of receiving some answer from the person to whom they are sent. The object of this amendment is to permit those who desire to advertise in that way to send out post cards, say in gross quantities, without such postage having been stamped upon the post cards themselves, and to require a deposit, in the post office from which the post cards are sent out of a sum sufficient to cover the postage on the matter sent out.

Now, at first blush it would seem that there would be no particular advantage to the Government in doing anything of that kind, but this matter has for a number of years undergone some investigation on the part of advertisers. The matter came into my hands through a constituent of mine, by whom I was informed that sometime last summer, when the Post Office bill was pending before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the matter was called to the attention of the Postmaster General. I have inquired of the Postmaster General and ascertained that on July 3, 1912, he wrote this letter to Senator BOURNE, chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and which will throw some light on the question of revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JULY 3, 1912.

Hon. JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There is considerable public demand for a postal arrangement by which the postage on return mail matter sent by advertisers and others may be paid at the office of original mailing, but, after careful consideration by this department, the conclusion has been reached that there is no authority under existing law for putting such plan into effect. Believing that the inauguration of such system would provide a needed public convenience, and at the same time increase the postal revenues, I have the honor to recommend that there be inserted in the pending postal appropriation bill legislation therefor in substantially the following form:

"The senders of mail matter who desire to pay postage on replies thereto to the number of at least 2,000 identical pieces are hereby granted that privilege upon their depositing, at the time of mailing, a sufficient sum to pay first-class postage thereon, the payment to be made in such way, and under such regulations, as the Postmaster General may prescribe."

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in view of the statement that is made therein by the Postmaster General, this is only a measure to assist, as I think, the business men of our country, the advertisers of our country, and there should be no objection made to this amendment at this time.

There is nothing particularly serious about it, and I can very easily see that if this plan is adopted by the Post Office Department, after the passage of a provision of this character, the revenues of the United States Post Office Department would increase very materially, because of the fact that more persons would take advantage of the opportunity to send out these post cards, provided they believed they could get them returned.

Now, if that is the case, and it is for the general benefit and general welfare of the business men of our country, I can see no reason why it should not go into the law.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think it better that legislation along this line should come as a whole instead of piecemeal in this way? Does not the gentleman think it would be better to wait until action is taken by the commissions that are to report on these questions? There have been no hearings had before the committee on this proposition, and I doubt the wisdom of taking it up here in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the first time. Oftentimes many views are developed in reference to these matters coming in connection with other postal matters that would influence us.

I suggest that the gentleman had better not press it now. I agree with the gentleman that the postal laws of our country need revision, but I do not believe this to be absolutely necessary, and think we should wait until the Hughes commission's report on it can be fully considered and acted upon.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. So that we may understand the amendment. At present the practice is to send out, either with a letter or a circular, a regular postal card for reply. The person who sends those out must pay postage on the postal card by buying the postal card, whether that postal card be used or not. Under the gentleman's amendment, as I understand it, the person sending these out would not have to pay the postage when they were sent out, and would not have to pay the postage on any of the postal cards except those that were returned to the sender.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. The proposition is that the sender shall make a deposit at the place from which he sends the postal cards, say from the city of Washington, for instance, covering the number of cards that he sends out, and then after a certain specified time, which would come under the rules and regulations that would be promulgated by the Postmaster General, the money would be returned to the sender for those cards that had not been used.

Mr. MANN. Under existing law the person who sends these cards out in the first place has to pay the postage whether they are used or not.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Many of them are not used. Very few of them which come to me are used, and every Member receives a great many. Now, under the gentleman's amendment the postage would not have to be paid except on those postal cards which were used. How would that be to the advantage of the Government?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I believe if a regulation of the kind proposed by this amendment was put into effect, it would result in more general advertising of this character by the merchants of the country at large. In other words, instead of 2,000 being sent out through the mails in envelopes, or by what is known as the return post card, that same merchant might send out 5,000 or 10,000.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman thinks it would add very materially to the number of these circular letters with the postal cards contained, which people generally receive and which have already become quite a nuisance.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. That is a matter for the recipient to decide.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that it is proposed to charge no postage at all on postal cards unless they are returned?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. That is it exactly.

Mr. MONDELL. If a million are sent out and only 100 are returned, where would the postal revenues stand on that kind of a proceeding, and what is there in the gentleman's proposition to provide for the sending out of these cards in such a manner and with purpose to bring a return?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I believe that would be a matter for the individual advertiser to determine for himself.

Mr. MONDELL. But the individual advertiser may well be content if he can get, say, a million post cards sent out, many of which would be read, and but few returned.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. If there were a million sent out, the Government would receive the revenue from the sending out of the 1,000,000, whereas if he only sent out 10,000 the Government would only receive the benefit of the revenue on the 10,000. By the increased number sent out the Government would be the beneficiary.

Mr. MONDELL. Evidently the gentleman has not understood my question or the question of the gentleman from Illinois, or I have not understood him. Is the postage paid on the postal cards sent out, without regard to whether they come back or not?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Not in this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. That is it. Then, it is not true that the Government would get the postage on the postal cards sent out. It would get no postage at all except on cards sent out that came back.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I am afraid the gentleman does not understand me.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I think my question was reasonably clear. Does the sender of the postal cards, in the first instance, pay the postage on the transmission of the cards originally, without regard to whether the cards come back or not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Let me answer that question. The gentleman has received what are called return postal cards?

Mr. MONDELL. The proposition stands as I suggested, that a man might send out a million cards without caring very much whether any of them came back or not, provided he could get some advertising from the sending of the million cards, and if none came back he would pay no postage at all.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. He would pay 1 cent on every double card sent out.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what I have been trying to learn.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is what I am trying to tell the gentleman. He has seen double postal cards, and on the outside one there is a 1-cent stamp printed.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, I will propound the question to the gentleman from New Jersey. Is it proposed that in any event the postage must be paid on the original transmission of this postal card?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Let us get this straight. We send out a double postal card, on one part of which the stamp is printed. If you want to return the other part you tear it off and put a 1-cent stamp on it. It goes now with the one stamp, and if the party receiving it does not detach it and put a stamp on the other part it is never returned.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Now, as I understand it, the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes that that arrangement shall continue as to the sending out, and the Government shall get the same pay for sending them out that it gets now.

Mr. MONDELL. And that is to be paid for by the sender without recourse.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly; just as now.

Mr. MONDELL. And this proposition is that the postmaster shall simply collect the return postage on those that are returned?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is the proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. And it has nothing to do with the postage on the cards as they go out?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. That is correct; but I had not in view in offering this amendment what are known as the return post cards—that is, the double cards. The thing I had in view was the sending out of an envelope containing a circular and a post card, and then upon the return of this post card the postage would be taken from the deposit that was made in the post office from which the original circular or post card was sent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee insist upon the point of order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer and have read an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 20, on page 23, the following: "That hereafter seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants shall be mailable at parcel-post rates."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the parcel-post measure passed at the last session in the first section declared that fourth-class mail matter should include all farm products, but in section 6 it makes an exception to this declaration, providing "that this act shall not in any way affect the postage rate on seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants as fixed by section 482 of the Postal Laws and Regulations." Under that provision at least 60 to 70 per cent of the merchandise that the farmer would receive or send by the parcel post is excluded from the benefit of the lower rates granted by the parcel post. As an instance of how these rates discriminate against the farmer in this regard, I ask to read and have incorporated in my remarks a letter addressed to the Hon. A. F. LEVER from W. C. Geraty & Co. I might say that along the coast of South Carolina the industry of the growing of cabbage plants in the winter for shipment to northern States has developed into a great industry. During the shipping season 6 to 10 carloads a day are shipped. These plants are perishable, and immediately after their receipt at the express office must be delivered to the farmer. The farmer anticipated, with the passage of this bill, that he could save the time and the expense involved in this trip to the express office by receiving those plants, seeds, and bulbs on the rural free-delivery route, but he is denied this by the construction placed—and a proper construction—upon this act by the Postmaster General. W. C. Geraty & Co., writing to Mr. LEVER, illustrates the difference in rates as follows:

Practically all of the farmers buy their seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants from dealers or growers within a radius of 600 miles, and most of them from dealers or growers within a radius of 200 or 300 miles; therefore we will now make the comparison of the rates charged on all of the merchandise admitted to the parcel-post mails under the regular rates and the charge for these commodities admitted under discriminating rates.

For shipment within the first zone, or within a radius of 50 miles, an 11-pound package of merchandise would cost 35 cents. The same weight package of seeds, plants, etc., would cost 88 cents, or a discrimination of 151⅓ per cent against seeds, plants, etc. For the second zone, or within a radius of 150 miles, an 11-pound package of general merchandise would cost 46 cents; the same weight package of plants, seeds, etc., 88 cents, or a discrimination against the plants and seeds amounting to 91⅓ per cent. For the third zone, or within a radius of 300 miles, an 11-pound package of general merchandise would cost 57 cents. The same weight package of plants, seeds, etc., would cost 88 cents, or a discrimination against plants, seeds, etc., of 54⅓ per cent. For the fourth zone, or a radius of 600 miles, an 11-pound package of general merchandise would cost 68 cents; the same weight package of plants, seeds, etc., 88 cents, or a discrimination against plants, seeds, etc., of 29⅓ per cent.

By making a general average of these four zones the average discrimination against plants, seeds, etc., as compared with all other kinds of merchandise, would be 81⅓ per cent.

We feel satisfied, however, that at least 75 per cent of all of the plants, seeds, bulbs, etc., purchased by the farmers are bought from dealers and growers within a radius of 50 to 150 miles; therefore, on the largest percentage of these shipments there would be a discrimination in rate against these special commodities of over 120 per cent as compared with all other commodities admitted to the parcel-post mails.

Mr. AUSTIN. What reason does the Postmaster General give for his interpretation of the law which discriminates against the articles the gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that under the section there is no doubt that seeds, cuttings, bulbs, and roots can be mailable only under section 482 of the Postal Regulations, which rate is 2 ounces for a cent. It is declared that these commodities will be continued to be classed at fourth-class matter, but will be denied the parcel-post rates. I am informed that this was the result of a compromise which was necessary in order to secure the passage of any bill.

I can not understand it myself, because the parcel-post rate is 120 per cent less than the rate that is given to them under this section, and besides that, the great benefit to the farmer is not so much in the reduction of the rate but in the saving of time and the expense that he incurs by reason of having to stop his business and go to the express office, which is not always close to his farm.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit, is it not a fact that this class of commodity is paying third-class instead of fourth-class rates?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am frank to say whether this is third-class rate or not I do not know, but I know it is a much higher rate than under the parcel post. It is declared to be fourth-class matter, under section 482, but by this section the parcel-post rate does not apply to these particular articles.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In other words, as a matter of revenue it is classed as third-class mail matter?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I was about to suggest to my colleague that this is a very peculiar situation which arises on account of section 482. If a plant grower should send his plants through the mail, they would take the rate as prescribed in this section which my colleague has read. If he should take the full-grown cabbage and send it through the mail, it would take the parcel-post rate. In other words, the department holds, and I think properly so, that any seed or plant sent through the mail for propagation purposes shall go at the rate prescribed by section 482. You could send a bushel of wheat which is to be ground into flour at the parcel-post rate, but not a bushel of wheat that was to be planted. It is a rather anomalous situation that ought to be corrected.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, is not that quite the reverse of the general policy of the Government toward the transportation and admission from foreign countries of articles for purposes of propagation?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has not the whole policy of the Government heretofore been to give lower rates and greater encouragement to the transmission of articles for the purpose of propagation rather than merchandise?

Mr. LEVER. That is undoubtedly true, and I think I may say to my friend from South Dakota that if this matter had been more thoroughly considered, and had not been put through Congress at the close of the session, this contradictory situation would not exist in the law.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think it is remarkable that it ever should have gotten into the law.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it amounts to this in the case of cabbage plants: A cabbage can be sent through the mail in the first zone—an 11-pound package—for 46 cents under the parcel-post rate. A package of cabbage plants weighing the same amount costs the farmer 88 cents. Right now we have to make an explanation to these dealers. These dealers, believing that the parcel post was the blessing to the farmers that it was heralded to be, prepared advertising, expecting to ship the cabbage plants to the farmers. They wrote to the Post Office Department in December for instructions as to how they should be packed and prepared. They were informed by the department that they could not send them at parcel-post rate. We have heard from the dealers. Later, when the farmer in the gentleman's district, who expected to purchase them and have them shipped to him at the parcel-post rate, is informed by the dealer or the grower that he can not ship them by the parcel post, but that he will have to pay the express rate, as he now has to do, and will have to continue to go to the express office, the farmer then is going to write to the gentleman about it, and he will be called upon to explain what we have tried to explain, that a cabbage can go through at the parcel-post rate but that a cabbage plant can not. If the gentleman can satisfactorily explain that, I wish he would send me a copy of his letter, for it will help me out materially.

I now desire simply to say this to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who reserved the point of order: I know it can be said that this matter can wait until some other session of Congress, but the condition of this matter is this: If this bill in the Senate is in the hands of as efficient and competent a chairman as we have in the House, the bill may get through in time to enable the farmers this spring to purchase the plants and have them shipped at the lower rates; but if the point of order is made, and we do not have an opportunity to remedy this evil now, certainly for this season and the next season the farmers will have to bear this burden instead of enjoying the blessing of the parcel post.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that for years under the present postage rates onions sent as seeds went at one rate and onions sent as food went at another.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I have not been aware of that, and I would hate to have to explain why that is so.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] said to the House that under the existing law cabbage plants sent to be planted went at a higher rate than cabbage which was grown for food, which is true. It is also true that before the parcel-post law was passed a cabbage sent for food went at double the rate a cabbage sent for planting did. So the fact that there is an inconsistency now is because there was an inconsistency before. If the House will pardon me for making a little statement in reference to this matter, I would say that when the parcel-post proposition was pending before Congress at the last session the American Seed Trade Association, covering not only seedsmen but people who grow plants for sale, entered a vigorous protest against the parcel-post proposition which was pending before the House and the Senate. They desired to have a flat-rate parcel post, and opposed covering into the parcel-post law their commodities, which then enjoyed a special rate of one-half the ordinary rate for similar commodities. The printers throughout the country did the same thing. There were a great many protests sent by printing houses and others engaged in the preparation of circulars and printed matter, insisting that the proposed parcel-post bill would increase their rate. I helped to eliminate both propositions from the bill, as far as I had any influence, so that the parcel-post bill might become a law. When it became a law these gentlemen found that the protests which they sent out in language which was very vigorous and sometimes unparliamentary, as far as use in a legislative body was concerned, was a mistake on their part; that the parcel-post law which they were vigorously opposing, if applied to them, would have given better rates than they were enjoying. It is very likely that ought to be corrected; but it applies to books, it applies to printed matter, and it applies to all of the third-class matter, and if a change is to be made it seems to me it ought to be made, taking into consideration all those articles which formerly went at a lower rate than an ordinary parcel and which now go at a higher rate. The change should not be confined to merely young cabbages intended for planting.

While I sympathize with the gentleman, it is true that the cabbages pay no higher rate now than they did a year ago at this time. It may be that they have been discriminated against in this way, but they have lost nothing. They go at the same rate now that they did a year ago. I do not know whether the American Seed Trade Association, including all of these growers practically, or the men who furnish the seeds and who grow large quantities, want the rate changed or whether the printing trades want the rate changed and apply the zone system to their business instead of the flat-rate system which now prevails. But it is a matter on which there ought to be some hearing before a proper committee, and the whole subject, it seems to me, ought to be considered when this bill goes to another body, where, if the gentleman will call it to the attention of that body, it can be considered, and, as I take it, it has not been called to the attention of the committee of this body, I shall feel constrained at this time——

Mr. LLOYD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that the cabbage to which he now refers, if it should be sent to the fifth or sixth zone, would be required under the parcel-post law to pay more than under the existing law?

Mr. MANN. That would depend largely on the size of the package.

Mr. LLOYD. Suppose the package is 4 pounds?

Mr. MANN. I have not figured that out. I do not know; but, of course, these packages now go under the flat rate.

Mr. LLOYD. Under the flat rate they would pay 8 cents a pound, and it would not make any difference whether it was 1 mile or 10,000 miles. Now, under the parcel-post system it would depend on the distance as to what it would be, and, as a matter of fact, if this amendment were to become a law, seeds sent to a remote part of the country from where they are started would have to pay more under the parcel-post law than they pay under the existing law. So that does not remedy this matter altogether. It does remedy it in the first or second zone.

Mr. LEVER. Up to the sixth zone.

Mr. MANN. And for that reason, it seems to me, it ought to be considered by a committee.

Mr. LLOYD. As the gentleman is well aware, there is a Parcel Post Commission charged with the investigation of such matters as that, and they happen to be investigating it now. I am not a member of the commission, and so I do not know what is being done in regard to it. But the matter needs to be adjusted. These gentlemen are right in wishing something to be done so that the fourth-class rate may be adjusted and this peculiar instance that may be mentioned will be corrected. But this Parcel Post Commission is charged with the duty of making recommendations, and will probably suggest that which will remedy this imperfection.

Mr. MANN. I am quite frank in saying that a situation exists which needs remedying, and the reason these matters were left out of the parcel post a year ago was because none of the gentlemen of the House thought it desirable just on the eve of the vote in the House to have the House bombarded with letters and telegrams from all the printing houses of the country and all the people engaged in the growing or selling of seeds against the parcel-post proposition, which they did not understand.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if he will permit it, that while I do not know what consideration the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has given to this proposition, I think it only just to myself to say that I took the matter up with the chairman of that committee and filed with him a letter from Mr. Geraty, fully explaining this situation, a letter similar to the one that my colleague [Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina] has read.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That was after the bill was reported.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think it was really during the first days of the session.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Would not it be possible, in view of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], and in view of unanimous opinion that this ought to be corrected, to have the Parcel Post Commission investigate the matter pending the time the bill goes to the Post Office Committee in the Senate?

Mr. LLOYD. I am not able to reveal anything as to what has been done. I am not a member of the Parcel Post Commission, and I do not know just what they have been doing. But I had a conversation with the chairman, in which we had something of a discussion of the very matter that is now before us.

Mr. KENDALL. Of course there was no impropriety whatever in the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], but it seems it would offer a solution to this difficulty, which would be a very proper and adequate one. If the Parcel Post Commission could consider this question, together with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the printing trades, and then make a recommendation to the Senate, it would cover the business entirely.

Mr. LLOYD. This defect in the law applies to books as it does to this matter, and recommendations should be made to bring the third-class——

Mr. KENDALL. Have a general revision, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. LEVER. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is that there is here a matter that should be remedied immediately, and therefore, having agreed upon it, there is not much further use of having a controversy about it.

Mr. KENDALL. It simply means making two bites of one cherry.

Mr. LEVER. And we are willing to take the bite now.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is a difference between the section as to the books and this one; that under the section under which they are now mailable they are declared to be fourth-class matter, and this is the only exception.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember that originally these commodities went as fourth-class matter. They secured special legislation to give them the same rate that is provided for third-class matter, and while they are nominally fourth-class, they are, in fact, practically third-class matter, and carry the same rate as third-class matter, and all the reasoning that applies to one applies to the other, probably. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] the other day—I will not say at the instance, but because of the action of some association of librarians—proposed that the parcel post should carry books under the same provision as other parcels are carried. A point of order was made against that, and I think properly, so that it might receive further consideration. I think the same thing is true of this proposition.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can only say for the Post Office Committee, inasmuch as the gentleman's point is that that committee has not considered the matter, that I am told by my colleagues that some members of the committee did consider it. There seems to be some misunderstanding as to when it was.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There is no misunderstanding in my mind about when it was. This bill was ready to be reported on the 10th day of December.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think the committee is ready to vote on this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Well, while I appreciate the desire of gentlemen to sell cabbage plants cheaply, or to distribute them cheaply, that is not the only thing to be considered. I think all these things should be considered in a proper way. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order, and the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery, including all money-order offices, $105,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that line 21 has not been read. There was something pending that was the order of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read line 21.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 23, after line 21, by inserting the following as a new paragraph:

"That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

"'Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural or star route mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C: Provided, That in calculating or otherwise ascertaining the distance that mail is transported over any highway, such distance shall be measured or calculated in only one direction, and only one use of or travel over any such highway, or any part thereof, on any one trip by a carrier using the same, shall be considered. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural or star route mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act under and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed jointly by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made under the provisions of this paragraph for the use of any privately owned or toll road.'

"That provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1914."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that that amendment is subject to a point of order and obnoxious to the rules of the House. I make a point of order against it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withhold his point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not feel justified in taking up the time of the committee in withholding the point of order, in view of the fact that there is a road commission engaged in looking into this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes a point of order against the amendment. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, and for the purchase of copying presses, numbering machines, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the postal service, $80,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I do it for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. Do they have no occasion for repairing or exchanging numbering machines? Heretofore the item has carried a provision for the purchase, exchange, and repair of various machines, including numbering machines. By the language this year the authority, so far as numbering machines are concerned, is only for the purchase of copying presses, numbering machines, and miscellaneous articles. Do they have no occasion to repair or exchange numbering machines?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman's attention to the language beginning with line 4:

For the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines.

Mr. MANN. And the item continues—

And for the purchase of copying presses, numbering machines, and miscellaneous articles.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman's question was relative to——

Mr. MANN. Numbering machines.

Mr. FINLEY. I understood it was computing machines.

Mr. MANN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said "numbering machines." I supposed there was some occasion for repairing or exchanging numbering machines. What is the occasion for limiting that part of the authority simply to the purchase? The authority to purchase is included, of course, in the first part of the paragraph.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We do not object to putting that in, because they do own and repair some of them.

Mr. MANN. Then if you strike out the language "for repair and purchase" you would have authority to purchase and repair all the machines provided under the current law.

Mr. TILSON. Strike out the word "and."

Mr. FINLEY. Is the gentleman from Illinois through?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I am through.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, on line 6, I move to strike out the words "and for the purchase of."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina kindly state the amendment again?

Mr. FINLEY. On page 25, line 6, strike out the words "and for the purchase of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, line 6, strike out the words "and for the purchase of."

Mr. KENDALL. You want to strike out the word "and," in line 5, too.

Mr. FINLEY. And in line 5, page 25, strike out the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And in line 5, page 25, strike out the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. MANN. It is all the same amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, both amendments will be treated as one.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by star routes (excepting service in Alaska), including temporary service to newly established offices, $7,105,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star-route service the patronage of which shall be served entirely by the extension of Rural Delivery Service, nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of new star-route service for a patronage which is already entirely served by Rural Delivery Service.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. HARDWICK took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be removed from office and be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate to the President of the United States and to the House of Representatives the foregoing order and judgment of the Senate and transmit a certified copy of the same to each.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed sundry bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 20339. An act for the relief of Joseph W. McCall;

S. 7637. An act to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Illinois River near Havana, Ill.;

S. 8000. An act providing for publicity in taking evidence under act of July 2, 1890; and

S. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution appropriating $40,000 for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 27148, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. The question is this, if the gentleman will give me his attention: Since the establishment of the parcel-post system the duties of these star-route carriers have, in many cases, if not in all cases, been very largely increased. Is there any provision under existing law by which their compensation can be correspondingly increased by the department without additional legislation?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not think there is any additional legislation needed on the subject, and we could not put in additional legislation under the rules. It would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But as these star-route matters are matters of contract with the department and the appropriation seems to be ample, there seems to be no reason why they can not readjust the pay on account of the additional service in the contracts.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will pardon me just a minute, these contracts are made for a period of years in the future?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have not investigated the subject recently, but I understand in a general way that it has been contended in the past at least that any change in the length of service or the character of the contract, of a physical kind more than anything else, has been required to authorize these readjustments in compensation. For instance, if the route were extended or if for any reason it were more difficult to perform the service, that has been held to be sufficient to authorize these readjustments. But I am afraid the view of the department will be that without authority of law they can not compensate these carriers for this additional service imposed by the parcel-post system. If the gentleman can give me any information on that point, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. My understanding is that under such conditions they can compensate under the general postal act; but under the contract itself, if the Government were to impose burdens far in excess of those contemplated when the contract was made, evidently the obligation would not exist to carry it out any further on the part of the contractor; and the option rests with the Government all the time under this contract to annul the contracts and make new ones.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but I am speaking of the act from the standpoint of the man who has made the contract with the Government. He has no such option.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I know he has not, but under the general postal law he has the right to refuse to carry out the contract, as I say, if the burdens imposed are far in excess of those contemplated when the contract was made.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to get the gentleman's opinion on that. I understand, then, that under the general postal law——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Under the parcel-post law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Under the parcel post the Government could make regulations without additional legislation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. This bill makes appropriations for the year beginning next July.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. The contracts will expire before that time and the bidders for star routes will have to take into consideration this new service.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think all the contracts do expire before the 1st of July, and if the appropriation of seven million and some odd thousand dollars for this service is on the basis of the duties that were required of these carriers before the adoption of the parcel-post proposition, then it will be apparent offhand, I think, that there will not be enough money appropriated to pay them if you are to increase their compensation because of these additional duties imposed. Ought not the appropriation for that reason to be larger?

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will take the Post Office appropriation act of last session, on page 22 he will see a provision that the Postmaster General may readjust the compensation of star-route and screen-wagon contractors if it shall appear that, as a result of the parcel-post system, the weight of the mail handled by them has been materially increased.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is a complete answer to my first question. Now, I will ask another question of the gentleman from South Carolina. Is this appropriation made on the basis of looking out for that?

Mr. FINLEY. We are unable to say how much the weight of the mails will be increased on account of the parcel post, but it will occasion no inconvenience and no harm to the contractors. We will meet here next December, and long before the expiration of the fiscal year, and whatever increased appropriation is necessary Congress can provide for at that time.

Mr. HARDWICK. As a deficiency, if necessary.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Under the policy of the department they are gradually decreasing the number of star-route contracts and covering them into the rural service, and this bill provides for $73,000 just along the lines the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then it does cover that?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia will be withdrawn.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 21, strike out $7,105,000 and insert $7,355,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may have the attention of the committee for a brief discussion of this amendment in line with the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Gentlemen will recall that star-route and screen-wagon contractors are peculiarly affected by the adoption of the parcel post. These contractors contract to carry the mail for a certain sum per annum without regard to weight, and it has been the habit of star-route carriers from time immemorial to carry small packages for the patrons of their routes, for which they are paid varying sums. The very small pay which they receive—smaller in proportion to the service rendered than any other class of postal employees—8 cents a mile on an average against about 14 for the rural-delivery carrier—is partly excused on the theory and in view of the fact that the star-route carrier does secure some small income for the carrying of parcels. Therefore the parcel post affects him adversely in two ways. First, it takes from him the income which he now has and which was contemplated in the letting of his contract for the carrying of parcels for the people along the route. Second, it burdens him with the additional weight for which he receives no additional compensation. These facts were so well understood that when we passed the parcel-post bill we made a special provision, which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] has referred to, authorizing the Postmaster General to readjust the pay of these men on the basis of the increased weight carried by them. What are the facts with regard to the appropriation? The committee have granted what the department asked for. The difficulty is that the department did not make their estimate high enough, and that was admitted in the very brief statement made to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], who was the only member of the committee who asked any questions with regard to this item.

He questioned Chief Clerk Satterfield with regard to this item, and in answer to his question the statement was made that the proposed increase is "very, very small," and I think he might have well said very, very, very small. What is the fact?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I suppose the gentleman wants to be accurate?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. LLOYD. The expression was "very conservative."

Mr. MONDELL. "Very conservative"? I thought it was "very small." I want to be accurate, and I want the gentleman from Missouri to be accurate. On page 93 of the hearings——

Mr. LLOYD. It is on page 92 of the hearings.

Mr. MONDELL. I am referring to page 93 of the hearings, line 5, where he says, "we have Congress to come to if we need more money, and that is the reason we made it very, very small." S-m-a-l-l—small.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; but when asked in regard to the matter he said, "That is conservative; very conservative," and the chairman said, "Do you ever make any other kind of estimates than conservative ones?" And Mr. Satterfield said, "I said very conservative. There is this to be said about that. When we get to it, when we actually face the situation, we have Congress to come to if we need more money, and that is the reason we made it very, very small."

Mr. MANN. He undoubtedly thinks "conservative" and 'small" mean the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes. I have studied this question considerably, and I am deeply interested in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri, if he will bear with me, to the fact that the estimate is not only "very, very small," but it is erroneous. The department started out to estimate the cost of the increase of this service upon the statement that the cost of the service the last fiscal year was $6,769,000. The cost of the service was in fact $6,819,297 for the year 1912, or about $50,000 more than stated.

Now, starting out with a sum $50,000 too small, they then estimated the cost of the first section, a net increase of $154,256. That increased cost is known because these contracts will be let very shortly. Then they estimate for all of the other sections, a less increase in cost than the actual increase of cost in the first section shown by the bids in the first section.

In other words, the actual increase in cost in the first section, where bids are already received, is 11½ per cent. They estimated the increased cost in the other three sections at less than 3 per cent, or about 2½ per cent. So, starting with an amount $50,000 too low, reducing on account of reduction of service, adding the known increase in the first section, then estimating an increase altogether too low for the other sections, they arrive at a conclusion that is very far short of what will be necessary to conduct this service.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Before I yield I want to show what the committee has already done in regard to parcel post in connection with other estimates. Either the committee is wrong in regard to other items or it is wrong in regard to this, and the committee can take it one way or the other.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to lay the foundation for him?

Mr. MONDELL. Not now.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not want information?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois can not give me any information on this matter, for I know more about it than he does.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so.

Mr. MONDELL. I not only think, I know.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has a good opinion of his own information.

Mr. MONDELL. I may not know very much, but what I know I know as well as the gentleman from Illinois does. I have given this matter some attention, and the gentleman from Illinois has given it no attention, in my opinion.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Wyoming is wrong; I have given some attention to it.

Mr. MONDELL. There were only two questions put in regard to it in the hearings, and those were by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Wyoming is not more accurate with reference to his other facts in regard to this, we need not pay much attention to it. The questions were not asked by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not necessary to ask questions in order to have information.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Missouri did ask some questions in regard to the matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Where?

Mr. MONDELL. The chairman asked some questions, too, in regard to the matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Missouri did not ask any questions.

Mr. MONDELL. Very well, we will let the chairman have his way as to who asked the questions. I want to call the attention of the chairman and of his committee to the fact that they increased the appropriation by reason of parcel post on behalf of everybody except the man in the country that carries the star route. He is forgotten.

In the Alaska appropriation you increase the appropriation 80 per cent on account of parcel post, or practically $200,000. In the matter of steamboat transportation you increase the item $160,000, approximately, or 12½ per cent, on account of parcel post, and for that reason alone, because in all these cases the various items are carefully put down and the parcel-post increase is carried by itself. In the matter of mail-messenger service the item is increased $165,000, or 9 per cent, and in the matter of post-office car service there is an increase on account of parcel post—and these increases are all increases specifically by reason of this service—the increase is approximately half a million dollars, or 11 per cent.

But when you come to the star-route carrier, the only man who had to take an additional burden, who had no option because he was under contract, you take away from him, on the one hand, his income heretofore received, and, on the other hand, put the additional burden on him whether he would or no because he is under contract to carry the mail. Now, I am not blaming the committee, unless it is to blame for not having gone into the matter more carefully with the officers of the Post Office Department. They allowed the amount estimated.

I have offered this amendment in the best of faith, and I have offered an amount so small that certainly the committee can not in good faith do anything but accept it. I am only proposing to increase this item 2½ per cent, so that with the increase already in the bill it will be an increase of 3½ per cent, when there is no other service affected by the parcel post that is not increased in this bill by at least 9 per cent. Under the circumstances it seems to me that this increase of $250,000—not quite 3 per cent of the amount carried—is exceedingly small. The same terms can be applied to it that the department applied to the very, very limited increase they proposed. It is altogether too small, but it will at least give us such a sum that the department will be able to afford some little relief in the case of these men who are now receiving smaller pay for the work they do than any other class of people in the postal service. I want to make this clear, because some member of the committee may suggest that this item ought to have been reduced in contemplation of the probable cutting off of star-route service, but that has all been considered in the estimate as made up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make only a remark or two in reference to this matter, it not being the disposition of the committee to cut off the appropriation for this service. My friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] very strenuously insists that he is very familiar with this question. He is very positive in his views. I called attention awhile ago to the fact that he had not studied this question as closely as he thinks he has, because he said there were no questions asked on that subject except by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD]. Here is the record, and it shows that Mr. LLOYD did not ask a single question on the subject, but that the chairman and others did.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Tennessee think that is really very important?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; it is not very important.

Mr. MONDELL. I read this entire record, and I do not think it is so extraordinary I forgot who asked one or two questions.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I say it is not very important so far as the facts in the case are concerned, but it is important to show that the recollection of the gentleman is not as good as he said it was. I will demonstrate a little further on that he is in error about other matters. Mr. Chairman, whether he intends it or not, the gentleman's remarks have left the impression on this House that the star-route contractors occupy the same sort of relation to the Government that the rural-route carrier and the city carrier occupy. We know that is not so. The bids are submitted for carrying the star-route service, and the man gets a contract under his bid. He gets it from the Government, if he gets it at all, and at the figure that he fixes himself for the carrying of the mail. It is immaterial whether he has made a good bid or a bad bid. It is his judgment. But the Government is beneficent and just; it does not want to change the contract by adding burdens to it without giving him additional compensation, so the law of the land has provided for a readjustment of compensation by the department.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman provided in his bill for readjustment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then the question comes, have we given money enough for that purpose, and that is all he could complain of. The main reason the gentleman insists upon is, that we do not give as much in proportion to the service here as we do under other heads. Let us see whether we do or not. Here is a constantly diminishing service, a service that is being covered rapidly into the Rural Delivery Service, one that will be wiped out after a while. The appropriation here for this service is $7,105,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. All those matters of reduced service were taken into consideration by the estimate of the department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand they were taken into consideration, and so were some other facts that I am going to relate. It was not necessary to use in the last fiscal year $205,428 of the money that was appropriated for the purpose of carrying on this service in adjusting these differences, yet the department comes up and in view of the law and the authority that is conferred upon it, to deal justly with these star-route men, it asks this committee to reappropriate a large sum of money and for an additional sum of $73,000. So we have to-day, with an appropriation that carries only $7,105,000 the sum of $378,400 to make good any burdens that may be imposed or may have been imposed upon these contractors by reason of the change in the law. We have not only done fairly by them, but we have done liberally by them. We have given every cent that the department has asked and every cent that the facts justify.

Mr. MONDELL. Where does the gentleman find any provision for the reappropriation of any sum. There will be no such sum left at the end of the fiscal year as the gentleman suggests, and if there were, it would not be available for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by reducing the sum contained therein to $7,200,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the star-route carriers of America are not only the poorest paid of any mail carriers in the country, but they are required to travel over the worst roads in the country. They are really a class of people by themselves. They are required to send in competitive bids for every contract which is made for the purpose of carrying the mail.

It is entirely different with the rural-route carrier and the letter carrier. These men have fixed salaries, and when they are employed it is well known that their salaries are so fixed that they will receive the amount fixed by law. But in these competitive places the star-route carriers know nothing about the hardships in many instances which they meet in carrying these mails. I know one man who contracted in the southern part of my State to carry the mail on one of these routes, and he was required, as is required by all others, to give bonds for that purpose. He failed. He was carrying that mail some 40 miles a day on a salary of 88 cents a day, and he failed to comply with his contract. His bondsmen were required by the Government to carry the mail and make good the contract, and I know that one of the bondsmen undertook to carry out the contract and killed four blooded horses in trying to do so. And I say, Mr. Chairman, these men ought to be paid better, and I think that is the duty of this committee and of this Congress to look into such cases and see that these men are placed upon a salary, the same as rural route and letter mail carriers are paid. Mr. Chairman, they are required to carry the mail over the worst——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. No; I can not yield now.

They are required to carry the mail over the worst class of roads in this country, and for that reason I sought here by an amendment to secure national aid for the purpose of helping to construct post roads throughout this country in order to relieve this class of mail carriers. It was thought, Mr. Chairman, during the last session of this Congress that the amendment which I offered was good legislation. It passed this House by an overwhelming majority, and I offered an amendment embodying practically the same provisions awhile ago, in order to see what the House thinks of such legislation after the election. It thought it was good legislation before the election, and now I want to determine just what its views are upon national aid for the construction of good roads after the election.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that neither of these amendments will prevail. I think the committee has made ample provision for the star-route service. During the coming year 242 star routes will be discontinued, aggregating 2,408 miles, making a saving of $266,200. Does anybody assume that when you substitute rural service for star-route service there should not be a saving in the star-route service? It is a simple matter of mathematical calculation. It is easy to understand when you substitute rural-delivery service for the star-route service that you ought not to pay for both. If the department estimates only 1 per cent additional for the fiscal year 1913–14 for star-route expenses, it does so because there is much less territory served by the star-route method. It is absurd to assume that the star-route service should go on increasing every year in cost and at the same time have that service rendered by rural-delivery carriers. No business house in the world would act upon the argument of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]; no business could be carried on successfully by the method which he suggests.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has made ample provision for the work of star-route delivery. I am of the opinion that the amount recommended by the committee will be far in excess of the star-route needs. Why, last year over $300,000 of the amount appropriated was turned back into the Treasury, and this year we propose to take away from this service 2,400 miles of routes and pay $266,000 to rural-delivery carriers for performing that service. And yet the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] assumes that we should continue to increase the amount appropriated to meet his imaginary needs.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. There is no justification for the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Wyoming to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] yield to his colleague [Mr. McKENZIE]?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; surely, I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. What is the amount of the reduction in this item from that of last year?

Mr. MADDEN. We increase it 1 per cent.

Mr. McKENZIE. Notwithstanding the fact that these star routes are going out of existence?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely; and we increase it because, notwithstanding the establishment of these rural delivery routes, we realize that there will be some added work in the star routes remaining because of the establishment of the parcel post.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to ask if the department did not take all the gentleman has stated into account when it made its estimate?

Mr. MADDEN. The department took all of that into account and recommended only an increase of 1 per cent.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] allow me an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The department only recommended an increase of 1 per cent, it is true, but that was largely perhaps due to the fact that there was $305,000 of this appropriation unexpended.

Mr. MADDEN. And also due to the fact that a number of rural delivery routes have been substituted for star routes?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly; and they would have that sum available in the new appropriation in addition to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] complains that there is an increase of 9 per cent in the transportation allowance by rail; that there is an increase for other service, and a higher percentage of increase for still other service, while the star-route service alone is reduced to 1 per cent increase. The fact is that in every other branch of the service there is added work and justification for the increase recommended, whereas in the star-route service there is reduced work, and, consequently, justification for the reduced appropriations recommended by the committee.

The gentleman from Wyoming assumes that the committee does not understand what it is doing, but that he is all-wise, that he has information which nobody else could obtain and which no other Member of the House possesses. He is always certain that he is right, and quite certain that everybody else is wrong.

I do not think he helps his case much by assuming that he is the only one who knows the situation; by stating that members of a great committee, having given consideration to this important subject, have no knowledge upon which to base the action which they have recommended to the House.

It is not necessary to ask questions of some governmental functionary in order to be informed upon a subject. There are other methods by which information can be obtained. The members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, all of them, can read; they are industrious; they are at work. They realize that they have important duties to perform. They endeavor to perform them to the best interests of all the people of the country, and they are not, because of the activity and aggressive force of the gentleman from Wyoming, making recommendations for the appropriation of money for star-route service that is not justified.

I can understand very well why the gentleman from Wyoming is anxious to place himself on record aggressively in favor of large appropriations for the territory from which he comes. Much of the mail delivery there is by star-route service. Railroads are scarce. The country is mountainous. The gentleman is a true representative of that western territory. He never hesitates to ask, and he gets all he can, and, as a rule, he gets a good deal more than anybody else gets. I am proud of his aggressiveness; but I want him to understand that other members of this committee on the floor of this House have information upon the subjects that come before the committee for consideration—that he is not the only man who has any intelligence, the only man who has any wisdom, the only man who has any knowledge.

He was not exactly frank with the House when he made his statement about the needs of the star-route service. He forgot to lay the necessary foundation by stating that 2,408 miles of star-route service had been discontinued and turned into the rural free-delivery service, and that the country is expending $266,000 for that service which prior to that time was expended for star-route service. I hope that neither the amendment of my colleague [Mr. FOWLER] nor the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a wise man has said that it is better that a man shall not know so much than that he shall know a great deal that is not so. [Laughter.] That saying was never better illustrated in the world than by the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

He says that I assume to have information that others have not. I assume nothing of the sort. But the gentleman alleges facts which no one else can find anywhere, in any written or oral statement made by anybody on the face of the earth. The fact is that the department, in making its estimates for the star-route service, estimated—and it is on page 109 of the hearings, if the gentleman will take the trouble to read it—an expected reduction of mileage, and took it out of the sums they would otherwise have asked for.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. They took $205,326 from their estimates on the basis of reduced mileage. They add the sum of $154,256, on the basis of new contracts in the first section, to go into operation when this bill becomes a law, on the same day. After they figured the reduced mileage, figured the known increased cost, they added, on account of parcel post, approximately 1½ per cent—$150,000.

Now, in other parts of the bill the committee itself has increased the appropriations, directly and specifically, on account of parcel post. There are many increases not on account of anything but parcel post, but these increases that I am talking about are on account of parcel post and nothing else. In the case of Alaska they have added about $200,000, or about 80 per cent. On account of the mail messenger service they have added $165,000, or 10 per cent, and on account of railway post-office car service they have added half a million dollars, or 12 per cent. And on account of parcel post they added to the service most affected by the parcel post, upon which the greatest burden is placed by parcel post, namely, the star-route service, only 1½ per cent, and you can not get away from those figures because they are printed in the RECORD.

It is not any information that I have that other gentlemen have not, but it is information that I happen to have because I have read it, and some other gentlemen have not taken the trouble to do it.

I ask now not for the increase we ought to have for this service, not for the increase that the other services have of from 9 per cent to 12 per cent, but for a measly increase of 3 per cent. Still the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says we ought not to have it, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] says that because we contracted with these men before we had a parcel post, in spite of the fact that we gave them additional burdens, we ought now to deny them any relief because they made a contract with us before we put on the added burden.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MONDELL. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I was speaking of the relation between this service and the other. I do not insist that anybody should be denied any rights which they have.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is this increase of 1½ per cent that the gentleman is talking about an increase by reason of the parcel post on the basis of the old operations of the contract service, or 1½ per cent on the basis of the diminished service that is contemplated?

Mr. MONDELL. They first asked for what the service would call for if it were not for the parcel post cutting it down by reason of the expected increased mileage, and then they asked for 1½ per cent more on account of parcel post—$150,000.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. On the new basis?

Mr. MONDELL. On the new basis.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I move that all debate on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, is all debate closed on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois as well as on the other amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That was the motion proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota have two minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have not consumed any unnecessary time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am aware that the gentleman has not consumed any unnecessary time, and I do not want to shut him off. I shall be glad to let him have two minutes, with the understanding that the debate come to a close at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Debate has already been closed by order of the committee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. We have listened with a great deal of interest to a very heated debate over a question of fact. If the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is correct, and, as a matter of fact, this increased per cent for the parcel post on the star-route service is made upon the revised estimates after reductions have been made by the department in contemplation of the reduced mileage, the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] counts for nothing. I assume that the last statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], uncontradicted by the committee, is correct. If so, a very inadequate appropriation is made by this committee upon the subject of increased service by reason of the parcel post.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What statement did the gentleman think was uncontradicted by the committee?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. This statement that the increased appropriation estimated by the department and put in by the committee by reason of the parcel post for the star-route service is 1½ per cent of the estimate for the revised or reduced service by reason of the reduced mileage of 2,600 miles.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The fact is this: That the $7,105,000 appropriation was made in view of an unexpended balance of $305,000. So the department did not need all of the appropriation heretofore made, and we have added $73,000. That will give you a leeway on this question of $378,000 out of an appropriation of $7,105,000. Their compensation will not be affected.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Let me ask the gentleman the question which was propounded by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]: Is this proposed increase of 1½ per cent by reason of the parcel-post service on star routes based upon the estimates of the department in consideration of the reduced mileage of something like 2,600 miles in this service or not?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; it is in view of all the facts with reference to that service.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is it 1½ per cent of this reduced estimate, or is it not?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The appropriation is $7,105,000, and $73,600 was added to the parcel post primarily, and we have also taken into consideration the fact that there is an unexpended balance of the money heretofore appropriated of $305,000 which may be used, and this was supposed to be entirely sufficient in view of the fact that this is a diminishing service, which is being rapidly covered into the rural service.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I ask unanimous consent for an additional three minutes for the purpose of getting this information.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I ask that the gentleman be allowed three minutes more, as I have used some of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota have three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is possible that the committee have this subject clearly in mind after the statement of the chairman of the committee, but I have not. The argument has been waxing warm back and forth here between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] over this precise question whether this reduced mileage of something like 2,600 miles in the star-route service for the coming fiscal year has been taken into consideration in the estimate that the amount of allowance for parcel post increased service is 1½ per cent. I think that ought to be answered clearly and satisfactorily to the committee.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I shall be glad to answer his question.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. The amount carried in the bill is an estimate, of course, but it will not affect the compensation of any star-route carrier. He will receive his pay, whatever his contract calls for. Each and every one of them will receive what his contract calls for, whether the estimate is correct or incorrect. I think it is correct.

Mr. KENDALL. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. FINLEY. I think the estimate as carried in the bill is sufficient.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I give it as my judgment that it is pretty clearly established here that it is not sufficient.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of course, the deduction of 2,408 miles from the star-route service, which will be turned into the Rural Delivery Service, reduced the amount of work in the star-route service, and consequently reduced the necessity for a greater appropriation.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If that is true, then I am correct in what I have been assuming—that this increase is only 1½ per cent, based on the reduced amount. I want to say in the concluding moment I have that the gentleman from Wyoming is right in his statement that the increased burdens falling upon the star-route service are proportionately larger than upon any other service, and the increase on account of the parcel-post service in the star-route service is only 1½ per cent, whereas the lowest increase for any other branch of the service is 9 per cent. It is not an adequate appropriation for that branch of the service, which is going to receive in larger proportion than any other the increased burdens of the parcel post.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were 26 ayes and 47 noes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming demands tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, after line 3, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"To pay cost of readjustments of compensation of star-route and screen-wagon contractors on account of increased weight of mails by reason of parcel post as provided in section 8 of the act approved August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, $200,000."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment is not subject to a point of order because it proposes to carry out a paragraph of a provision in the parcel-post law. One of the paragraphs in section 8 is as follows:

The Postmaster General may readjust the compensation of star-route and screen-wagon contractors if it should appear that as a result of the parcel-post system the weight of the mails handled by them has been materially increased.

That is a provision of the law, and the appropriation to carry that provision of law into effect and to meet the expenses incurred is, of course, in order on the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not care to be heard, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the language just read by the gentleman from Wyoming, quoting from a provision from the so-called parcel-post law, which says:

The Postmaster General may readjust the compensation of star-route and screen-wagon contractors if it should appear that as a result of the parcel-post system the weight of the mails handled by them has been materially increased.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is the existing law, and I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming adds anything to it.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman proposes an amendment for an appropriation based on this law, and insists, therefore, that it is in order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The law provides for the payment, and he proposes to change it.

Mr. MONDELL. If the Chairman will permit, there is no way to carry out this provision of the law and give the beneficiaries the benefit of it except an appropriation, and this is the bill which must carry that appropriation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But I remind the gentleman from Wyoming that there is an appropriation already made.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no appropriation made at all for this purpose. If there were, that fact would not preclude the offering of another provision containing an additional appropriation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If it was in strict conformity with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The law seems to provide for a readjustment, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wyoming contains an appropriation to enable that readjustment to be made if it is desirable. If an appropriation is made at another place the committee will call the Chair's attention to it.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question as to the screen-wagon service and no question about the star-route carriers, and there is no doubt but that the bill provides additional pay on account of the parcel post. Both the question of the screen-wagon service and the star-route service are covered.

The CHAIRMAN. If that be true, that does not affect the parliamentary situation.

Mr. LLOYD. The only purpose of this amendment is to accomplish by indirection what the gentleman undertook to accomplish by his amendment a few moments ago. This is an indirect method of reaching that same result.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was not made to the other amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wyoming. It appears to the Chair that the law provides for a readjustment in the discretion of the Postmaster General, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wyoming provides the funds for that readjustment. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the House and detain the committee. We must remember that there are in operation star routes costing approximately $7,000,000. In framing the parcel-post law we realized that the law would impose a peculiarly heavy burden on the star-route carriers, and provision was made for a readjustment of their contracts. Now, assume for the sake of argument, and only for the sake of argument, that the appropriation in the paragraph just passed is sufficient for the ordinary purposes of the star-route service. This appropriation is necessary to provide for the readjustments which are contemplated by law.

Now, if the gentlemen here from the rural districts do not desire to have the carriers in their districts paid for this additional service, which is promised in the parcel-post law, very good. If the gentlemen from the city districts, who have increased the appropriations all along the line for city and urban service, want now to deny any measure of relief to the people in the country, why, of course, they are privileged to do that.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman a moment ago, in discussing the other amendment, insisted that only $300,000 was provided for additional pay that would come on account of parcel post. Now he argues on this amendment that we have made no such appropriation. The truth is we have undertaken to provide for the extra compensation that will come to the star-route carrier after the adjustment of the service. It is fully provided for in this bill, and there is no occasion for the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming in order to accomplish the result. Every adjustment is provided for, and every carrier who is entitled to additional compensation will receive it under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri takes up the most of my five minutes misstating my position and making an additional misstatement of facts. In the first place, I have not said at any time that no provision was made for increased cost on account of parcel post. I have said at all times that there was an increase of 1½ per cent, or $150,000. But that is not enough. When the gentleman says any provision is made anywhere in the bill for additional cost by reason of readjustments, the gentleman must have got his information somewhere except from anything written or printed in regard to the bill. There is not a line or a syllable in this bill to provide for the readjustment contemplated by the parcel-post law. The star-route carriers will not receive the sums due them by reason of the readjustments unless we make an appropriation for it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman upon what ascertained fact he reiterates the statement that the largest amount of the burden of the parcel-post service will fall upon the star-route carriers?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unfortunate in not being a resident of a rural district, otherwise he would know, and then perhaps he is further unfortunate in not having heard my opening remarks. I called attention to the fact that the star-route carrier has a contract without regard to the weight of the mail he carries, and that at the same time it has been the habit of star-route carriers, from time immemorial, to carry packages from the towns and deliver them along the line of their routes and receive compensation therefor. He now loses both ways. He loses compensation that he has heretofore had and he has an additional weight to carry without more pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield until I may make a motion?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I am still unconvinced from what the gentleman from Wyoming has said that the greatest amount of this increased service, because of the parcel post, will fall upon the star-route service. I have had an opportunity within a week to observe, for instance, what has happened because of the parcel-post act in the city of Newark, part of which is in my district. I went through that portion of the floor the post office devoted to the care of that service. The number of parcels deposited there under this act has increased daily by 1,000. As closely as I could in going by the countless miles, almost, of tables covered with these parcels, I observed that the addresses on almost all of them were within the first 50-mile zone. Within 15 days the service there has reached a sum of 12,000 packages, beginning with 1, and that amounts to an increase of about 1,000 a day, allowing for one holiday and two Sundays intervening. In New York City, which is within the zone where we are situated, the number of deposits of parcels have now reached 100,000 a day. Those packages are very largely directed to people within what we know in that part of the country as the metropolitan zone, within 50 miles of the city hall of Manhattan. When you deduct such enormous deposits of parcels from the total, I can not conceive that there is any considerable quantity of them going to reach the star routes in the gentleman's State.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman confuses the word "service" with the word "burden," which I used. The increase in the amount of service in the large cities is enormous. That simply means, however, adding to the force. That does not decrease the salary of anyone and does not necessarily increase anyone's work. It simply calls for more people to do the increased work. The star-route carrier, on the contrary, has his income decreased, because he no longer receives the small sums heretofore paid him for carrying parcels now carried by the parcel post, and in many cases these men are carrying these lines for half what they are worth, with the expectation that the other half of their income will be made up from this source which is now denied them.

In addition to that loss, a direct loss of revenue by reason of the parcel post, there is the additional burden of carrying that matter without any increased compensation. They are the only people under the service where the individual loses both ways. The force in New York and other cities is simply increased. More men are put on. The service is larger. The burden on any one individual is not any greater for any considerable length of time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I do not refer only to the force in the city which handles these parcels where they initiate, but to their ultimate destination.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, in that case they increase the carriers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a moment—but to their ultimate destination. They are also handled by rural free-delivery carriers and regular mail carriers. There is no burden from such a large initiative point; neither, presumably, from Chicago, which has the largest mail-order business in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, after line 3, insert: "That the provision in section 8 of the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, authorizing the Postmaster General to readjust the compensation of star-route and screen-wagon contractors, on account of increased weight resulting from parcel post, shall be held to authorize the allowance of increased compensation, if clearly earned, for service rendered prior to the issuance of the order for such payment."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the importance of this, because I think it is a matter which the committee must take up.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of substations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, $47,500,000: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 26, line 6, after the colon, insert the following: "Provided, That the unit of compensation for such letter carriers and substitutes for carriers shall be computed on the basis of 1 mile in the number of miles required to be traveled on any route in one day; Provided further, however, That because of the compensation herein provided no rural letter carrier shall receive less salary than before the passage of this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think it is generally understood that the standard rural route is 24 miles long, for which a compensation is allowed the rural free delivery carrier of $1,100.

Beginning with a route of not less than 6 miles and less than 8 miles, the department issued an order on the 24th day of August, 1912, under which, what we might term the "unit of compensation," the unit was fixed at 2 miles. In other words, if a mail carrier has a route of 23 miles daily, he is paid, under the order of the Postmaster General, $1.056, which comes under the unit of compensation for the length of route of 22 miles and less than 24 miles; and so on down over the various routes.

Now, in some routes, not very many, in western Pennsylvania—and I can speak advisedly of that—there are a number of carriers who receive compensation on a basis of 22 miles and some on the basis of 20 miles when, as a matter of fact, they travel as much as 23 miles, 23½ miles, and 23¾ miles on a 22-mile route, and the same in proportion on a 20-mile route.

A man supposedly traveling 20 miles in a 22-mile route travels as much as 21 miles and 21½ miles. Now, the free rural delivery carrier travels on an average 300 days in a year. If he travels 1 more mile per day than he is paid for he travels, then, in a year probably over 300 miles in excess of what he is paid for.

I agree that in some sections of the country this difference of a mile per day will not amount to so much, but if you take the case in western Pennsylvania or in West Virginia and in a great number of the New England States and especially in New York, where there is rural free delivery service, the life of the horse, the wear and tear of the buggy, and the maintenance of the horse will amount to a very considerable sum to the carrier each year. If you will take it through the sections that I have mentioned, there is scarcely a rural carrier who is not compelled to own at least two horses in the winter time.

I ask that this amendment may be adopted, and I trust that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will not insist upon his point of order. It is a very fair proposition. It is intended simply to pay the men the actual number of miles they travel. I am sure that it will make no very great difference in the general amount to be appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG] may be correct. I do not undertake to say that he is not. But I suppose there never will be found any method of adjusting the pay of the carrier, based on distance, that will be perfectly satisfactory to everybody. A matter of this sort ought to be considered by the committee before it is agreed to by the House. I therefore make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. And at the same time I wish to express my astonishment that anyone should make the point of order on the amendment just offered—perhaps no one but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would do that—because the pressure upon gentlemen by rural-route carriers in their districts has been so intense for years past that we have seen a constant succession of increases in the pay of the carriers, until we have reached the point that we are now actually paying men for carrying the mails on rural free-delivery routes just twice as much per mile as we pay men under contract.

Rural carriers who carry mail on macadamized roads out of this city and elsewhere are paid just twice as much for every mile they travel as men are paid on the average on the country roads traveled by star routes and more by considerable than carriers in my State are paid for carrying the mail across mountain ranges, where they may be compelled to go part of the way in wagons and part of the way on sleds and part of the way on snowshoes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to ask, What is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman confine himself to debate on the last word. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. I was saying that rural carriers travel over macadamized roads and receive twice as much pay as men receive who travel over country roads, facing storms and blizzards. And yet when I offer an amendment here proposing to do what the law says we shall do, even gentlemen from the rural districts on the Democratic side slavishly follow the lead of the committee—slavishly follow the lead of a committee that apparently has given no attention to this matter at all, because if they had they certainly would have dealt as fairly by the men that carry the star routes as by the men in other branches of the service.

But I suppose that is the way it will be in the future, as it has been in the past. The pressure of the rural carrier behind the average Member will probably continue to increase his rate of pay, while the poor devil who contracts with the Government and happens to live in regions from which there are not a great many Members of Congress is forgotten in contemplation of what gentlemen feel they must do for his more active and numerous brothers in the thickly settled portions of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. The difference between the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the most of us is that we have no devils carrying mail in most of our star-route districts.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel and miscellaneous expenses in the postal service, Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, $1,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The committee did not do me the courtesy to give me an opportunity to discuss even for a moment the very important amendment which I offered a moment ago.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] rise?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. To ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Is the gentleman going to discuss something now germane to the last section read or is he going to discuss some other subject?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I just want to insist that this debate shall close, and that the gentleman be confined to the subject of debate provided under the rules.

Mr. MONDELL. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is actually discussing matters relating to the postal service, and ought to be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. The paragraph has to do with travel—star-route carriers' travel over their routes; hence in discussing star-route carriers I am discussing the proposition before the House. I want to call attention again to the fact that Congress, realizing its obligation under the parcel post for increased burdens for the star-route carrier, made a provision for the readjustment of his pay. And it so happens there is a provision of the postal laws—section 1287, I think it is—which provides that no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of a pay order.

Now, the parcel post went into operation the 1st of January. These additional burdens on the star-route carriers began immediately, but there is no provision for their payment in advance of the issuance of an order for adjustment. We will not have a reweighing until April or May, and then, after we have had the reweighing of the mails, this section I have referred to seems to stand in the way of the readjustment and payment for services rendered prior to the issuance of the order for payment. There may be several months during which these men were rendering additional service for carrying largely increased weights, and yet it might be held that during that time they could not be paid. I hope the postal authorities will feel justified in construing the provision in the parcel-post law as repealing by implication this provision to which I have referred. Otherwise there must be some such amendment as I have proposed in order to meet the condition.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday evening I asked that the paragraph beginning on page 14, line 1, be passed over.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that we return to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. The paragraph under consideration begins with line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order which was made, the matter is in control of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I call up page 14, line 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay, in his discretion, rewards to postal employees whose inventions are adopted for use in the postal service, and for that purpose the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000 shall be paid for one invention.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MANN. It is impossible to reserve a point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I believe the paragraph was passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. It was not passed subject to a point of order being reserved. It was passed over after some discussion, I will say to the gentleman. I moved to strike out the last word, and asked that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The motion was that this be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. This item passed after the matter had been discussed. It is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's personal recollection of the situation is that immeditely upon the paragraph being read the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rose and moved to strike out the last word, and then a colloquy ensued between the gentleman from Illinois and the chairman of the committee. Then the request was submitted that the paragraph be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. That is correct. It was passed over for the purpose of returning to it in order to offer an amendment. It got beyond the point where a point of order would hold.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The RECORD shows this, if the gentlemen will permit, after the reading of the paragraph:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent that that paragraph be passed over without prejudice, with the object of preparing an amendment to make it conform with other provisions in other departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the paragraph just read be passed over without prejudice. Does the gentleman mean to be recurred to at the end of the bill?

Mr. MANN. To be recurred to by the committee whenever the chairman desires.

And then followed some other talk. The Chair is not at all clear that the point of order will be in order to this paragraph. It seems to have been passed without prejudice. The purpose of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. After an amendment was moved to it, it was too late to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, ordinarily that is true.

Mr. MANN. After the amendment which I proposed it was too late to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true ordinarily. The rule is sometimes very liberally construed. If there is any gentleman who would state that he at that time proposed to make a point of order, the Chair would be disposed to recognize him, but there is no statement of that sort. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] give his attention for a moment? The Chair was about to state that the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I simply reserved a point of order, and if the Chair decides it is not subject to a point of order because of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had offered an amendment to the paragraph, that, of course, ends it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to state this: That in view of the situation which existed at that time it was at that time the purpose of the gentleman to make a point of order.

Mr. HAY. It was not my purpose at that time, because I did not happen to be in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair thinks the ordinary practice ought to apply.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that this provision is in the existing law, so far as that is concerned. I asked to have it passed over to see whether we could not have an amendment inserted in place of the provision in the bill, which conformed to the law reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, so far as the Army is concerned, and a similar law adopted, so far as related to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], who introduced the bill that came from the Committee on Military Affairs and became a law, so far as the Army is concerned, drafted an amendment, which was introduced as a bill, to make the language here conform with the laws already adopted relating to the other two services. I will offer that as an amendment, so as to get it before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

On page 14 strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to offer and pay periodically a cash reward for the invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions for an improvement or economy in device, design, or process applicable to the postal service submitted by one or more employees of the Post Office Department which shall be deemed the most valuable of those submitted and adopted for use, and for that purpose the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That to obtain this reward the winning suggestion or invention must be one that will clearly effect a material economy or increase efficiency: Provided further, That the sums awarded to employees in accordance with this act shall be paid them in addition to their usual compensation: Provided further, That the total amount paid under the provisions of this act shall not exceed $1,000 in any month or for any one invention or suggestion: And provided further, That no employee shall be paid a reward under this act until he has properly executed an agreement to the effect that the use by the United States of the invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions made by him shall not form the basis of a further claim of any nature upon the United States by him, his heirs, or assigns, and that no application for patent has been made for any such invention."

Mr. MANN. That is simply to conform with the law already passed by Congress as a result of a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, as to the ordnance bureaus of the Government, and a similar provision, I believe, as to the Navy. The idea in offering the amendment is that the same condition shall prevail in the different services where this award is adopted. For instance, this provides, as is provided in the existing law relating to the Army, that the award can not be paid unless the Government is relieved from other claims for the invention, and no patent has been obtained for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the item on page 14, from lines 6 to 18, inclusive, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] yield to the gentleman from Illinois for the purpose of making that request?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Before yielding I want to ask the gentleman what he wants to do.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to offer an amendment in line 15. The language reads:

Substitute letter carriers and substitute post-office clerks employed in the city-delivery service of the Post Office Department.

I wish to strike out, in line 15, the words "the city-delivery service of the" and add to the word "office" the letter "s," and strike out the word "department," in line 16, and substitute for that the words "first and second class."

The reason for that, Mr. Chairman, is that in cities like Chicago, New York, Newark, Buffalo, and other large cities, they have four divisions in the post-office service, one known as the mailing division, one the registry division, third the money-order division, and fourth the city-delivery division. My fear is that the language as it appears in the body of this paragraph will be construed to mean that clerks in these large cities will not be entitled to the benefits of this bill, except such clerks as may be at work in the city-delivery division.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think that in legal effect the language the gentleman proposes and that in the bill are practically the same, and therefore I will make no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. In its present form it leaves it to the construction of somebody.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 14, line 6. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 15, strike out the words "the City Delivery Service of the"; add the letter "s" after the word "office" at the end of the line. At the beginning of line 16 strike out the word "department," and add the words "first and second class."

So that the clause will read:

Substitute letter carriers and substitute post-office clerks employed in first and second class post offices shall, when working for a carrier or clerk—

And so forth.

Mr. MADDEN. I move the adoption of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, whose duty it was to help prepare the appropriation bill now under consideration, and as a Member of this body who has tried to make a complete study of the postal service, I beg leave to submit a statement of facts for your consideration.

When I entered this House as a Member of the Sixty-second Congress, I was appointed a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Being desirous of knowing something of the postal service, which is so near and dear to the public, I sought information from the Post Office Department officials, and read reports of the Post Office Department, and interviewed many officials in local post offices whenever the opportunity afforded. I also sought information from the rank and file of the workers, such as the city carriers, the post-office clerks, the rural carriers, the railway-mail clerks, and the laborers whenever I had an opportunity of meeting them. It was not long before I discovered that there was only one source from which I could get any information that could be used in a public way with the statement where the information came from, and that was from the Postmaster General or his official representative.

The working force were bound and gagged by official orders which prevented them from making known anything pertaining to the postal service or the conditions under which they worked, and when they were asked questions they would refer me to the local officials. I soon learned that it was as much as a man's job was worth to give any information to the public or even to a Member of Congress. The invariable reply to my questioning was "You had better see the postmaster, as it is contrary to the rules of the service for employees to give any information."

In many instances I have questioned postmasters and supervisory officers, but with rare exceptions I could learn nothing of the actual inside workings of the postal service, notwithstanding the fact that as a member of the Post Office Committee I would be called upon to cast my vote for appropriations of more than $250,000,000 for conducting the service for one fiscal year. The only place I could get information was from the department officials in Washington, and in so far as I can learn not a single one of them has had actual experience in practical post-office work and they are issuing orders based entirely on theoretical knowledge. I made up my mind, however, that I would get at the facts, and by assuring the employees that I would respect their confidence and protect their interests I have been able to learn much. A great deal of this information I imparted to the Members of this House on April 12, 1912, which is contained in the official proceedings of that date. I will not attempt to burden you again with a repetition of what I stated at that time, but will confine myself to one subject that is before us in this bill.

The honored chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads introduced in this House on December 6, 1912, a bill for relief of substitute carriers and clerks in city delivery post offices. That bill has received the approval of the full committee and is now pending on the calendar. It is a bill possessed of so much merit that I believe it will receive the vote of every Member who knows anything about the conditions under which the substitutes are employed. It is a bill that cries out for justice for a body of men who have been working for a pittance for this great Government. Knowing the uncertainties of the enactment of legislation, no matter how much merit it possesses, the committee recommended that this legislation should be placed on the Post Office appropriation bill in the hope of getting it agreed to, in which event its success will be practically assured.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor in a few brief words to give you a résumé of the life a substitute clerk or carrier exists, for theirs is a mere existence if they depend on the position of substitute for a livelihood. As a rule an announcement is printed in the public press at certain specified times that a competitive examination will be held on a certain day and place for the position of post-office clerk and letter carrier. The information is given to the public that the salaries are fixed at an entrance of $600 per annum and that promotions are made automatically each year, and that the employees are allowed annual leaves of absence for vacations. In fact, the news item reads so well that it is an invitation to any bright, ambitious young man who has not decided on some particular career to enter the postal service, as the prospects look up brighter than in any ordinary business.

At these competitive examinations can be found some of the brightest and most intelligent young men in the whole community. After the examination is over the applicants wait in anxiety for the publication of the lists and for official notice from the Civil Service Commission, giving the percentage and relative standing of each. More anxious days are spent looking forward to and hoping for the official letter that calls them to the office of the local postmaster for appointment. What a happy day for the successful one, and how often is he the envy of his more fortunate if less successful neighbor. Well, Mr. Chairman, he obeys the summons and calls at the post office on the specified day, and with a heart filled with hope he takes the oath which is administered to the Members of this House and to the Postmaster General, and, in fact, all Government servants of high and low degree. His first official order is to procure a uniform, which he does. He is then turned over to a subordinate official, and then, Mr. Chairman, his troubles begin. In fact, he wakes up. Yes; wakes to the fact that it is all a dream. Instead of receiving an appointment to a regular position, with a fixed salary and annual automatic promotions and regular hours of duty and an annual vacation, he finds that all these things are but glittering promises. He is a substitute; and now let me tell you what a substitute is: He is a man who is required to report for duty in the morning as early as 5 o'clock in order to take the place of a regular employee in case one of them fails to report on time. If all the regulars report for duty and there is no work for him to do he sits around until granted permission either to go home or to a restaurant to get something to eat. He reports back again at a specified time, and if a regular employee is excused from duty for any cause the substitute is assigned to perform the work of the regular. If there is an extraordinary rush or influx of mail that can not be handled promptly by the regular employees he might be given a few hours' work. However, in order to show good faith, if he is assigned to duty he is paid 30 cents an hour for each hour that he is employed. If there is no assignment for him he sits around until the regular employees leave for their last delivery, after which he can be excused by his superintendent and permitted to go about his business. He might be at the post office from early morning until late at night and not receive a single cent because there was no actual labor to perform.

You ask the question as to how much it is he averages monthly. Well, Mr. Chairman, the average varies in each city, but the average for the whole country of all the substitutes is much less than $30 a month. Just think of it, and ask ourselves if this condition of affairs should not be remedied at once. And now, Mr. Chairman, let me tell you how long these men serve as substitutes. The average time served by the substitutes of the country is more than three years. There are men in the regular service who have probably served less time and there are many who have served for a far longer period. I had my attention drawn a few days ago to one particular case of a substitute in an office in Pennsylvania who has been serving as a substitute for more than 12 years, and the poor fellow is still hanging on in the hope of some day receiving a regular appointment. Such a condition of affairs is a shame and should not be tolerated, and I feel that the Members of this House will be glad of the opportunity to relieve this condition now that the facts are before them.

Mr. Chairman, the recommendations contained in this bill are modest in the extreme, and I am of the opinion that they can be put into effect without the necessity of making any additional appropriation of money.

In explaining the provisions of the bill I will endeavor to show the reasons upon which I base my conclusion that it will not require an additional appropriation.

There are two simple provisions contained in this bill which, if approved, will relieve the present unsatisfactory condition of the substitute employees. In the first place it is intended to pay the substitute the rate of pay of the regular employee in whose place he serves. When a regular carrier or clerk is off duty for any cause, with the exception of his regular 15 days' leave of absence, there is a pro rata amount deducted from his salary for all the time that he loses. This money reverts to the Treasury of the United States. Under the present law a substitute receives 30 cents an hour when working in the place of a regular employee, and if this recommendation of the committee is accepted the pro rata pay will be substituted for the 30 cents an hour. It will therefore be seen that this will not require an additional appropriation, as Congress must of necessity provide for the salaries of the regular employees as these salaries are to a large extent regulated by law. If the substitute performs the work of a regular employee, it is nothing more than equitable that he should receive the pay of the man in whose place he serves.

The second provision is to make the initial salary of an employee who has served as a substitute for one year or more $800. At the present time the initial salary is $600. If these employees were to start in on a regular salary from the time they receive their original appointments, the initial salary could be made $600 and there would be no complaint; but when we take into consideration the fact that they are required to work a number of years for a very meager and uncertain amount and that they are generally in debt when they receive a regular appointment, the initial salary should at least be sufficient to meet their necessary obligations and at least be a partial reward for the sacrifices that they make during their substitute service. I base my contentions that this will not require an additional appropriation, on the following ground: Wherever new service is about to be established, the employees start in under the present classification act at a salary of $600, and it is not proposed to change the law in this respect. It is only the employees who have substituted for a period of more than one year who will receive the benefits of the provisions of the proposed legislation. In cities where the service has been established for a period of years there are a number of changes made each year on account of deaths, resignations, and removals from the service for all causes. The employees whose places are vacated are as a rule men who have been in the service a number of years and are receiving the highest grade salaries. When a vacancy exists in an office, the appointment to fill that vacancy is made from the substitute list, and there is a saving in the amount between the initial salary of the new appointee and the salary of the employee who has been separated from the service. In this one item alone there is a large unexpended balance to the credit of this particular part of the appropriation bill at the end of each fiscal year. It will therefore be seen that in order to carry this provision into effect it will not require an additional appropriation of the public funds.

I have endeavored to show the merits of the proposed new legislation and am of the opinion that its enactment into law will work for the best interests of the postal service and will relieve a condition of affairs that to my mind should not exist in the Government service. I believe that this legislation is wise and just and that it will meet with public approval.

Mr. HAMILL. This bill carries a provision for relief of substitute letter carriers and post-office clerks that, in my opinion, should be enacted into law.

A great majority of the men who take the civil-service examinations for the position of clerk or carrier in the postal service do so under a very grave and serious misapprehension. The examinations are advertised inviting young men and women to take the examination, and the impression is conveyed that appointments are made from the eligible register to regular positions at salaries beginning at $600 per annum, with automatic promotions to $1,100 in second-class offices and to $1,200 in first-class offices. The facts of the matter are that the appointments are made to a substitute service, which carries no regular salary with the appointment. These substitutes are employed to perform temporary and auxiliary work at the rate of 30 cents an hour for the actual time that they are employed or to serve the places of regular carriers and clerks who are absent from duty for any cause. There is no certainty as to whether a substitute will be employed one hour a day or eight hours, or whether he will be employed at all. A substitute must, however, so regulate his affairs that he will be ready to perform service if called upon by the postmaster to do so. The period of time during which these men are employed as substitutes and before they receive regular appointments varies to a great extent. The average time of these substitutes is more than three years, and during this period of substitution they eke out a very precarious living. The result of such a system is that competent and efficient men will not stay in the service until such time as they receive a regular appointment, but give up as soon as they can find a position that is more certain of employment and returns. Many of these young men who seek outdoor employment continue to hold on and anxiously hope and look forward to the day when, through the natural increase in the service or through the death or resignation or separation from the service, a vacancy may exist, to which they will be appointed on the regular force.

The positions in the regular force of clerks and carriers are recruited from the substitute service, and to my mind the postal service should be constituted of the best possible timber from among our young men that can be induced to enter and make it their life work. The bill provides that when substitutes are employed in the places of regular carriers and clerks who are off duty without pay that the substitutes should receive the salary of the regular employees in whose places they serve. It provides that for auxiliary and temporary work or for service of regular employees who are on their annual vacations that the substitute shall receive pay at the rate of 30 cents an hour. It also provides that when one of these employees has served as a substitute for a period of one year or longer that the initial salary on entry to the regular service shall be $800 per annum. It is not much that the committee has offered, but it is sufficient to meet the modest requests of the substitute carriers and clerks. It is reasonable and it is just, and I hope that the recommendation of the committee will meet the approval of the Members of this body.

Mr. MADDEN. The provision in the Post Office appropriation bill on page 14, providing for the payment to substitute clerks and substitute carriers when assigned to the work of regular employees absent on vacation or when performing auxiliary or temporary work, of 30 cents an hour, is one which should meet the favorable action of the House; and the provision which admits of the appointment of substitute carriers and substitute clerks who have served as substitutes for a period of a year or more at a salary of $800 a year instead of $600, as at present, is but simple justice to the men engaged in the postal service.

The average time which a man appointed as a substitute is required to serve before being appointed to the regular service is three years. During that period he is required to report for duty every day, and if he should happen to live in a large city like Chicago or New York he would have to pay car fare to and from his home. After reporting in the morning, if there should not happen to be any employment for him, under the rules he is required to remain for several hours awaiting orders, and if there should be no need for his services only then would he be free to go; and all the time while he was reporting for duty he would be unable to accept other employment. After his appointment as a substitute he would be required to purchase a uniform and incur other expense connected with his appointment as such substitute. While acting as a substitute he would be required to study schemes for the distribution of mail, for which service he would receive no compensation. At best he would not be able to earn during his service as substitute over $30 per month. He would be fortunate if he earned that amount. At the end of two or three years he probably would have worked himself up to the head of the substitute list and be ready for appointment in the regular service. He naturally would find himself in debt when he secured the appointment because of the long time he had served as a substitute without pay. To be required, then, to enter the service at $600 a year has worked a great hardship on the men who have entered the service. Fifty dollars a month for the first year's service would not pay his current expenses, to say nothing about the indebtedness which he had incurred during his service as a substitute. Fifty dollars a month does not mean that the man entering the service would get $600 a year, because part of the year he might be sick, during which period his salary would be deducted, and it is fair to assume he would not average more than $480 the first year. He never could hope to reach more than $1,100 or $1,200 a year in the service, and to do that he would have to remain in the service several years.

The interest of the public service, I think, will be best served by dealing justly with the men who enter it. The best men in the citizenship of the country should be encouraged to enter the public service. Six hundred dollars a year to begin with does not seem sufficient to encourage men of the highest type to seek employment in the postal service. Eight hundred dollars, which this provides for men who are regularly appointed in the postal service, comes nearer a just compensation for the work required than that paid in the past.

This proposed legislation means that even substitutes are to be better provided for than they have been heretofore. In the future they are to receive the regular pay of the clerks or carriers who are absent from duty without pay, when they are employed in the place of such clerks or carriers. This is as it should be. If a substitute acts in the place of a regular clerk or carrier he ought to receive the pay. This bill provides that he shall receive it. When the substitute is employed to perform the work of regular employees absent on vacation, or when performing auxiliary or temporary work, he is to receive pay at the rate of 30 cents an hour. This is the same condition which prevails under the present law.

Nothing could be more just than the proposition to pay men who have served as substitutes for from one to three years without pay the sum of $800 per annum on first entering the service as regular appointees.

I have long believed that a great injustice was done the postal clerks and carriers by requiring them to enter the service at as low a rate as $600. The men entering this service must have an education; they must be able to pass the examinations; they must be gentlemen; they must have ability of a high order; they must go to considerable expense in the purchase of uniforms. They are required to give a large amount of their time to the Government free for several years before being regularly appointed. During all the free time given to the Government they are required to do a lot of important work, such as familiarizing themselves with the details of the distribution of the mails. After they are appointed regularly it is not merely the question of the eight hours which the law requires them to work and they are called upon to serve, but when they are off duty it frequently happens their time is occupied from one to two or three hours a day in studying the schemes that they are required to understand.

The abolishment of the $600 and $700 grades is a step in the right direction. The payment of $800 per annum to clerks and carriers, in the first instance, is a work of simple justice on the part of the Government. Their work is exacting, it is constant, it is wearing. The men who enter the Government service should be encouraged to give the best there is in them. This legislation will inaugurate such a system of encouragement.

The work of the Post Office Department is becoming more voluminous. The department is dealing with every household in the land. It is the arteries, so to speak, through which flows the daily information which the people receive on the live topics of the day. The instrumentalities through which this lifeblood of information flows should be an active force in the distribution of the information sought. Young, virile, forceful, systematic, courteous, intelligent, painstaking, active, untiring men should be encouraged to enter the service of the Post Office Department to the end that the people may, through them, be able to feel themselves intimately connected with the Government and satisfied that the Post Office Department, as an instrumentality for the distribution of information, has performed its functions in such a way as to encourage the people in the heartiest cooperation for the maintenance of Government institutions.

I am glad to have been associated with the other men on the Post Office Committee who have had the courage and the foresight and the sympathy necessary to bring about this salutary improvement in the working conditions of the men who are always faithful to the trust reposed in them and who have no motive except the performance of their duties to the satisfaction of their superiors and the general good of the public. I congratulate the men themselves on the success of the legislation, and I venture the prediction that its enactment into law will create an esprit de corps in the Post Office Department which will justify the committee in their belief that the payment of the additional money involved by the increase of salary to the men entering the Post Office service will yield to the people returns far in excess of the money involved.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That stage of the consideration of the bill has been passed.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, during the last session of Congress I took occasion, at the close of the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, to say something in connection with that measure and the number of splendid features it contained. I also took occasion to congratulate the House upon the fact that we had in the person of the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the right man for the right place. [Applause.]

A few days ago there was read into the RECORD by my colleague [Mr. SIMS] an editorial from Mr. Bryan's paper. That editorial stated that Mr. Bryan entertained the hope that President Wilson would not seek to fill his Cabinet on grounds of gratitude, but that he would, in making his selection, find the best men for the positions.

The great Post Office Department is a business department. It affects the vital interests of all classes of our population. No bill reported to this Congress dealing with postal affairs carried so many wise and progressive provisions as the Post Office bill reported at the last session of Congress. It had a provision providing for the safety of postal employees in compelling the railroad companies to construct steel cars for the protection of the lives and limbs of postal employees. It had a provision fixing and defining eight hours for the employment of clerks and other employees in the postal service. It carried a wise and just and long-delayed provision looking to the reclassification of the railroad postal clerks. It carried a provision which we have been discussing here in the consideration of the bill—the parcel-post system, which will be a boon and benefit to every community and a relief from the oppression of express monopoly that has robbed and oppressed the American people for years and years. It had in it a provision looking to national aid for the construction of public roads. First, the adoption of the Shackleford amendment, which was afterwards changed by the Senate and agreed upon in conference, in which there was a provision creating a commission, which is now engaged in preparing a bill which will be reported to Congress providing for national aid in road improvement, which will do much for our entire country and be of benefit to every farm, village, and hamlet. It carried an increase of pay for more than 40,000 rural free delivery carriers in the United States, men who work in and out of season in all kinds and conditions of weather and roads and whose burdens and trials have been increased on account of the creation of the parcel post.

Then it had also a provision which gave the postal employees the right, without intimidation, to appeal to Members of Congress for redress or an investigation of any grievance that they might have—the repeal of the so-called gag law. It carried with it a provision looking to an annual leave of 30 days to these hard-working and deserving public postal officials.

Now, the man of all men to whom the American people, in my judgment, was indebted for this progressive legislation is the Hon. JOHN A. MOON, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the American people would be serving their best interests in selecting as the Chief Ruler of this Nation of practically 100,000,000 of people as a public servant a man who has seen long years of service either in this Chamber or in the Senate, but in the absence of the selection of such a man it is of vital interest to all the people that in the selection of all the officials of his family, in order to avail himself of a faithful and satisfactory administration of the public affairs of this country, that he, the President of the United States, should not fail to select his advisers and get as many of them from the trained, experienced lawmakers of Congress as he can. [Applause.] And in the selection of the Postmaster General for his Cabinet no man should be intrusted to that position who has not had the training and experience enjoyed and possessed by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. [Applause.] President Elect Wilson, looking at the interests of all the people, and certainly the success of his administration, can not do better in the selection of a Postmaster General than to honor the man and his administration with the appointment of the Hon. JOHN A. MOON, of Tennessee. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the so-called Cullop amendment in line 24, page 22.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote not only on the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Connecticut, but also the so-called Bartlett amendment on page 3, line 5.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the paragraph beginning at page 12, for compensation to clerks in charge of contract stations, wherein there was an increase of $50,000, known as the Mann amendment.

The SPEAKER. The remaining amendments will be agreed to in gross.

The remaining amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first vote will be taken on the so-called Bartlett amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, at the end of line 5, by inserting: "And provided further, That no part of the sums herein provided for the salaries of post-office inspectors or for per diem allowances to such inspectors shall be paid or allowed to them while they may be engaged in making selections and recommendations for the appointment of fourth-class postmasters."

Mr. MANN. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. MANN. It will do no good to make that point now.

The SPEAKER. That is a work of supererogation. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 116, answered "present" 7, not voting 139, as follows:

Mr. ESTOPINAL with Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania.

Until February 1:

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. LONGWORTH.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no" on this roll call. I have just been informed that my colleague, Mr. FIELDS, is absent on account of illness in his family. I promised to pair with him if those circumstances arose. I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. LANGLEY was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and be recorded "present."

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name was called or should have been called?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I just came in.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman hear his name called?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman inside the Hall when it was called?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I was not in the Hall. I just came in a moment ago, as the roll was being concluded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rules.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 5, erase the figures "700" and substitute therefor the figures "750," so that it will read "$750,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment, which is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, after line 24, insert the following:

"That the Executive order of date September 30, 1910, whereby assistant postmasters and clerks at first and second class post offices were placed within the classified civil service, and the Executive order of October 18, 1912, whereby fourth-class postmasters were placed within the classified civil service, are hereby annulled and set aside."

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I ask for a division of the two questions advanced in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first half of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Executive order of date September 30, 1910, whereby assistant postmasters and clerks at first and second class post offices were placed within the classified civil service——

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The amendment having been adopted as one amendment by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, is it in order to provide for a division of the amendment in the House? And, as reported by the Clerk, there is no substantive proposition there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the last remark.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk did not report any substantive proposition. If you adopt what the Clerk read, it would be like debating that much hot air. It would not say anything.

Mr. CULLOP. The two propositions are not divisible, as I understand it, from the manner in which the amendment is drawn.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The rule about this question is very simple. It is as follows:

On the demand of any Member before the question is put, a question shall be divided if it include propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain.

There is no such condition existing in this amendment. You will have to hitch the last part of it onto either one of the two propositions in order to make a substantive proposition, and if you hitch it onto one of them and make it a substantive proposition the other one is not a substantive proposition. So the request is overruled.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CULLOP. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 140, answered "present" 6, not voting 129, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. GARRETT with Mr. RODENBERG.

Until further notice:

Mr. GOULD with Mr. HINDS.

Mr. BRANTLEY with Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas with Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. CLAYTON with Mr. CRUMPACKER.

Mr. FERGUSSON with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. GEORGE with Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. GUDGER with Mr. HIGGINS.

Mr. HAMMOND with Mr. FORDNEY.

Mr. RAINEY with Mr. LANGHAM.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina with Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. WHITE with Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota.

Mr. LANGLEY. How am I recorded, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. In the negative.

Mr. LANGLEY. Being opposed to this amendment, I voted "nay"; but I am paired with my colleague, Mr. FIELDS, and I therefore desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay"; but I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening?

Mr. HAUGEN. I was right at the door when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. HAUGEN, and he voted "nay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit this bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] opposed to the bill?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I am not opposed to the bill in the sense that I would vote against it as it now stands, but I am opposed to a provision in it as it stands, and I would like to get it out.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Kansas opposed to this bill?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am.

The SPEAKER. Under the rulings the gentleman has the right, being on the committee, to offer the motion to recommit. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] is also on the committee and ranks the gentleman from Kansas, but the gentleman from New Jersey did not answer affirmatively.

Mr. MURDOCK. I move, Mr. Speaker, to recommit the bill with instructions, and upon that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MURDOCK moves to recommit the bill H. R. 27148 to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions to amend the bill as follows: At the end of line 21, page 17, strike out "$49,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000," and add thereto the following: "Provided, That no part of such appropriation shall be used in transporting mail matter consisting in any part of any letter, circular, packet, newspaper, magazine, or other periodical, advertising for sale, either directly or indirectly, any spirituous, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors for transmission to or delivery in any State, county, or municipality wherein the sale of such liquors is or may be hereafter prohibited by State law; that the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation for the purpose of weighing the mail and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid to railway companies for transporting the mails by excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States," and to forthwith report the bill so amended.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it necessary now to demand a division and make any point of order, or will that be in order after the vote is had on the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks if the gentleman has a point of order, he would be on the safe side to make it now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, first to demand a division of the motion, and I also make a point of order against the proposed amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. I make a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will conduct the matter decently and in order and will hear what the gentleman from Kentucky has to say.

Mr. SHERLEY. First, I desire to ask the Chair whether it is in order now to make the point of order or after the division of the question?

The SPEAKER. What point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. Any point of order that would lie to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I make the point of order that the motion is out of order, as not being germane to the bill, and I demand a division of the motion. And I desire to make a point of order, also, to each of the various affirmative propositions contained in the motion.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] can not make the point of order and demand a division.

The SPEAKER. Well, why not?

Mr. MURDOCK. Under the rules of the House he might make a point of order, but——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] or any other gentleman has the right to make a point of order. There is no question about that. It does not make any difference whether the point of order is well taken or not, for the purpose of this statement. Then the gentleman from Kentucky or anybody else has the right to demand a division of the proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, can he do both of these things at once?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what he has done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not possibly entertain both propositions at once.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is my point.

The SPEAKER. But so far as the amendment not being germane to the bill is concerned, the Chair overrules the point.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit me to be heard, I will be glad. If the Chair is against me, I do not desire to waste the time of the Chair or my own; but if the Chair will permit, I would like to present a very serious proposition that is involved here.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood the Chair to say that he overruled the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did say that he overruled the point of order, but the Chair does not think that his decision offhand is infallible on any proposition, and the Chair is always willing to gather information wherever he can. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be reported again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the motion to recommit.

The motion was again read.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire——

Mr. MANN. I make the further point of order that this is not offered as one amendment, but is two amendments, and it must be decided that one amendment is in order and that the other is not.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois contend that this is not one amendment?

Mr. MANN. It is not one amendment. According to the wording of the amendment it provides to strike out $49,000,000 and to insert $48,500,000, and add thereto——

Mr. SHERLEY. It was just that point——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois seriously contend that the words which he has practically quoted—

At the end of line 21, page 17, strike out $49,000,000 and insert in lieu thereof $48,500,000—is one amendment and that what follows after it is another?

Mr. MANN. I contend this, Mr. Speaker: Under the rules of the House, the motion to strike out and insert is indivisible. If this were the ordinary motion to strike out and insert language, it seems to me it would not be divisible, but the motion is made to strike out language and insert other language, and then it goes on and proposes to add another paragraph to the bill. I can not see how this is offered as one amendment. It is not a motion to strike out and insert as one indivisible motion, and is not so offered.

The SPEAKER. What is the reason it is not? It says:

At the end of line 21, page 17, strike out $49,000,000 and insert in lieu thereof $48,500,000, and add thereto—

And so forth.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the Chair will permit, I desire to add this to what the gentleman from Illinois has said: It is true that this is not one proposition even in the sense that the amendment offered in Committee of the Whole presented one proposition. But I desire to ask the Chair to reconsider the matter, notwithstanding the decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on substantially the same proposition. I submit to the Chair this fundamental proposition, that it can not be in order simply by offering an amendment that itself is in order, and then adding to it in the form of a substantive proposition, whatever you please, to make the subsequent matter in order, if it would not otherwise have been in order. In other words, you can not take one proposition like the reduction of an amount which is in order, and having made that, then simply by the use of the word "and" carry along into order, because of the company it is keeping, any proposition whatsoever; but the very right to demand a separate vote upon every substantive proposition carries with it necessarily and logically the right to have the question determined whether that substantive proposition is itself in order. Otherwise the rules become matters of nonsense, and all you have to do in order to avoid and disregard the rules as to what is in order and as to what is germane, is to make one amendment cutting down the amount of an appropriation, use the word "and," and then gather anything to it that you see fit.

Now, here are three substantive propositions. If they were not, the right to a division could not be had upon them; and I insist that, being substantive propositions, representing each a distinct proposal, a point of order may lie as to any one of them, and you have the right to have the point of order considered as to any one of them. If that premise of mine be properly taken, I further insist that the second affirmative and substantive proposition has nothing in it to make it in order under the Holman rule, and it has never been contended that it was in order as a limitation upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist that under the Holman rule an amendment that would not be germane under the general rule can not do anything except cut down the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean to say this, that anything that would not be in order as new legislation is only made in order by the terms of the Holman rule when it does one of several things; and so as not to risk my memory I will read to the Chair the exact rule. Rule XXI itself expressly declares what it must be that shall make it in order. That rule says:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order—

> except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

Now, all of that contained in the proviso does not apply here, because here is no motion made by authority of any committee or commission, but a motion made upon the individual responsibility of a Member, and I insist that the second proposition does not come within the rest of the Holman rule. It does not show on its face that it is a reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill, nor that it results in the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

I appreciate that this matter was discussed at length in the Committee of the Whole; but I submit to the Chair that if the Holman rule means what by the construction put upon it by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole when this matter was up yesterday, it is said to mean, we have reached the point when that very salutary rule to protect the House against hasty and ill-considered action which prohibits new legislation upon an appropriation bill, has been absolutely whittled away and now amounts to nothing. It is within the ability of the mere novice in parliamentary law now to offer any provision in such a form as to make it in order on any appropriation bill, and it was for that reason that I asked the indulgence of the Chair, even though the Chair has indicated an opinion contrary to that which I am urging.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Kentucky has pointed out, individuals in this House are only empowered to take advantage of the Holman retrenchment rule if the amendment which they propose does certain things. It must cut down salaries, reduce the number of public officials, or reduce the amount carried in the bill. Now, yesterday the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] introduced an amendment which contained a broad legislative proposition, and coupled with it was a direct reduction in terms of the amount carried in the bill. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole—wrongly, I think—decided that inasmuch as a reduction was carried on its face the whole amendment taken together was in order. Before he made his ruling I asked the parliamentary question as to whether it was proper to demand a division of the question at that time, so that we might have a separate ruling on the legislative proposition. To this the Chairman replied that in his opinion any demand for a division of the question must come later, after he had decided the point of order against the Jackson amendment as a whole.

After the Chair had given his decision a division of the question was demanded for the purpose of voting, and this demand was granted. The House at once negatived the first section of the amendment, to wit, the proposed reduction. This negative vote left nothing before the House except the legislative proposition, which was simply a change in existing law likely, as was alleged, to result in a retrenchment.

The Holman rule permits committees to recommend changes in existing law which entail retrenchment, even if there is no reduction in the amount of money appropriated. Individuals, however, have no such right.

After the committee had negatived the reduction the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] raised the point of order that the second division of the Jackson amendment no longer was in order under the Holman rule. Against this the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] raised the point of order that the question of order had already been decided by the Chair, inasmuch as he had decided an inclusive amendment to be in order. The Chair agreed with the gentleman from Alabama. This ruling, by the way, is directly contrary to the doctrine laid down by Mr. Crutchfield a number of years ago, which I shall read to the Chair in a minute or two. The point is that a situation had been arrived at where the amendment awaiting the action of the House no longer met the conditions imposed by the Holman rule, even assuming the soundness of the Chair's original decision.

The Chair had ruled that the coupled proposition was in order; but the proposition had been uncoupled, and the committee had rejected that portion which was essential under the Holman rule. The Chair sustained the gentleman from Alabama and held that his original ruling covered the entire Jackson amendment, even though the surviving portion of that amendment might be obnoxious to the point of order.

Now, if the Speaker will permit, I shall read Mr. Crutchfield's views. In the star route case cited yesterday an amendment was proposed reducing the appropriation by the nominal sum of $500,000, and a legislative proposition was coupled with it concerning contracts for star routes. Here is what Mr. Crutchfield says in his manual:

> It will be noted that the point of order was made against the amendment as a whole. The propositions contained in the amendment were divisible, namely, first, to substitute $49,500 for $50,000; and, second, the provision "to be disbursed in such manner," etc. The second branch of the amendment did not of itself result in a reduction of the amount carried by the bill, and had a division of the question been demanded and a point of order made against the latter branch the provision changing the law as to the manner of disbursements would no doubt have been held out of order.

That view of Mr. Crutchfield seems to be based on sound parliamentary philosophy. I think the Chair was in error yesterday in holding the contrary. As the gentleman from Kentucky has said, the result of the series of rulings made by the Chair yesterday is this: The privilege reserved by the Holman rule for committees alone, to wit, the privilege of proposing retrenchment amendments, whether or not they carry a reduced appropriation, is now thrown open to every Member of the House if he attaches a provision reducing the total amount carried in the bill. In other words, if these rulings are to stand, there is no retrenchment amendment which a committee is empowered by the Holman rule to propose which can not equally well be proposed by an individual who exercises a little ingenuity in drafting his amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts contend that a Member in a motion to recommit can not offer anything except what the committee can offer on the floor of the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I contend that he can not offer in a motion to recommit that which would have been out of order if offered in the Committee of the Whole House. In addition, I believe that by a demand for a division of the question, which I believe to be quite in order, we can get another ruling from the present Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the proposed motion by the gentleman from Kansas, in my opinion, is subject to the point of order because it involves legislation in violation of the rules. It is not necessary to discuss whether it comes within the provisions of the Holman rule or not, because, regardless of that rule, in my opinion, it is not in order. It contains a positive direction to an executive officer to do a certain act. It either controls the discretion which he now has under the statute or imposes upon him a duty which he does not have. No amendment ever submitted, purporting to be in order because it purported to reduce expenditures, has had coupled with it a proviso attempting to control the discretion of any executive officer, particularly if that part of the amendment of itself was not a substantive proposition which on its face retrenched expenditures.

This amendment provides that the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation—for the purpose of weighing the mails and reducing the rates of compensation now paid to railroad companies for transporting the mails by excluding said class of mail from the mails of the United States.

Such a provision as that attached to an amendment purporting to reduce the amount carried by the bill has never, in any ruling with which I am familiar, made under the Holman rule, been held to be in order.

This provision is similar to a number of provisions of a somewhat similar character that from time to time have been held contrary to the rule.

Paragraph 3854 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, the Chairman, Mr. Hepburn, in a ruling upon an amendment states:

A provision authorizing and directing an officer of the Government to do things involves legislation.

Legislation of such a peculiar character has never so far been seriously contended to be in order on an appropriation bill on the ground that the retrenchment was to be effected and the amount carried by the bill reduced.

Eliminating the balance of the amendment it would read:

Strike out "$49,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000"; Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation—

And so forth.

This proposed direction to the Postmaster General has no relation whatever to the terms in which the appropriation in the bill is carried. It is not germane to that particular provision, and it is an affirmative direction to the Postmaster General to utilize a certain portion of the appropriation in a certain way, which either in itself is legislation or else it attempts to control the discretion which he now has under the law, and which under a long line of precedents has been held to be legislation. I submit that under those circumstances this proposed motion, if offered as an amendment, either in the committee or in the House, would be subject to the point of order, and the same rule applies when it is offered as a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York this question: Can the language in this motion beginning with the word "and," after the proposed reduction, be considered in any proper sense a limitation on the appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Speaker refers to the word "and" where it occurs after "$48,500,000," and add thereto the following?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If any portion of that provision is subject to a point of order, it all would be subject to a point of order. It has been repeatedly held that a direction to use a specific part of an appropriation carried in a provision can not in any way be construed to be a limitation. It is not a limitation upon the use. It is a direction as to the use. That is one of the clear lines that is drawn between what is a limitation and what is not. A limitation withholds an appropriation from use in certain ways. This directs the use of the appropriation by the Postmaster General in a particular way.

Either he has the power under the law to use it in that way or he has not. If he has not the power, this is legislation. If he has the power and has the discretion to use it or not to use it in the particular manner, this is an attempt to control the discretion lodged in him by the statute, and that has been construed to be legislation. Any attempt to control the discretion lodged in an official as to his action, as to his use of money, is legislation, while a limitation does not control the action of the official at all. It merely inhibits the use of the money for a particular purpose. This amendment clearly has in it such affirmative directions to the Postmaster General as to constitute an attempt to control his discretion, or to determine that he shall act in a particular manner. Under a long line of rulings, such an attempt has always been held to be legislation.

The provision of the bill, page 17, line 21, which this seeks to amend, is:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $49,000,000.

The amendment endeavors to strike out "$49,000,000" and to insert "$48,500,000," and to add a direction to use a particular portion of that sum in a particular manner.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to state that he was not familiar with any precedent holding that such a proposition as the gentleman just stated was in order. I wish to direct his attention to the ruling of Mr. Chairman Carlisle, made before he was Speaker, or at the time, at least, when he was not Speaker, and which was cited by the Chair yesterday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have not looked at those rulings recently, although I have examined them very carefully on other occasions.

Mr. GARRETT. It is to be found on page 1471 of the RECORD, near the bottom of the last column. The gentleman will there find the question, and then at the top of the next column he will find the ruling of Mr. Carlisle.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there is a very clear distinction between the two amendments. One was that the Postmaster General "may" use a certain sum, while this amendment provides that he must use it. It is very clear that that did not attempt to limit his discretion in any way, while this compelled his action in a certain way. The language of this amendment is:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed.

He has no discretion in the matter at all. It removes any discretion he may have, and the ruling to which the gentleman calls attention, I think, is based upon an amendment which in a very essential feature is so different that it does not cover this particular case.

The pending motion is not such as to be indivisible. So far as it purports to strike out $49,000,000 and to insert $48,500,000 it is indivisible; but it adds after the insertion positive, substantive, independent legislative provision. They do not depend for their vitality upon the matter to be stricken out or inserted. They do not on their face purport to retrench expenditures, and such is not their purpose. It is an attempt to utilize a beneficial rule to enact legislation never contemplated as in order under it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, within the last 24 hours I have been twice up against rulings on the Holman rule. The rule which we have in this House which goes to the scope and definition of the power of an amendment to an appropriation bill must have been in the first place adopted to save appropriations from general legislation, and it seems to me that the gentlemen who have preceded me to-day, particularly the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], have been arguing in terms of simple limitation. The Holman rule is a definite departure from the philosophy of strict limitation. The Holman rule necessarily is built upon the proposition that you may change existing law and that you may touch upon the discretion of an executive officer. Yesterday, preceding this present amendment, which was ruled in order by the Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], I defended another amendment which came in the bill from the committee.

The Chairman held that under the Holman rule that amendment did not show a reduction in expenditures on its face. In other rulings under the new Holman rule I note that that seems to be a vital and essential part of an amendment in order under that rule, namely, that it shall show not only a reduction but a reduction on its face. Now, this amendment offered originally yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] does show on its face a reduction. It is germane, was held in order yesterday, and I do not believe that the Speaker can hold that it infringes upon the discretion of a departmental officer and still keep full vitality in the Holman rule. I want also to say while I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, that this is a motion to strike out and insert, and under the rules of the House it is not divisible.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Waiving for the moment the question of a point of order, does the gentleman think that no division could be had upon a proposition like this so as to have a separate vote on the different affirmative propositions?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think under the rules of the House, this being a motion to strike out and insert, it is not divisible. The rule so states in specific terms.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me ask the gentleman this question: According to the gentleman's contention, is it not possible, if it be correct, by simply moving a reduction of any amount and then using the word "and" to couple any legislation, whether the legislation be germane to the paragraph or not?

Mr. MURDOCK. Exactly; and that is the object of the Holman rule. Let me say to the gentleman that I believe he is also arguing in the terms of strict limitation. The basis of his remarks to-day is that we can not change existing law.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not, in my judgment, know the real philosophy of the parliamentary rule.

Mr. MURDOCK. That may be true.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not mean that offensively. I am going to try to show you. The reason for a rule that limits legislation on appropriation bills is because the experience of legislators has shown that without it it results in ill-considered and unwise legislation. Therefore the general rule, that has been a rule for more than 60 years, was brought into play. Then there came along the desirability of economy, and therefore the other rule was justified for the particular purpose of economizing. But the reason for the other rule applies with all its force unless you are economizing. Therefore it must follow that in considering the Holman rule it must be considered strictly so as to clearly show that every affirmative proposition is let in because of the virtue it had in economizing.

Mr. MURDOCK. I know; but I have no dispute with the gentleman from Kentucky on the statement he now makes. But this amendment does show a reduction on its face, and it does then come within the Holman rule, and it accomplishes the very thing the Holman rule wants to accomplish, as described by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I believed in the gentleman's premises, it would be possible to admit his conclusion. I insist they are different propositions——

Mr. MURDOCK. Let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that he has said to me repeatedly in private conversation that there is a remedy in the rules of the House for everything.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not remember of ever having said it, by the way.

Mr. MURDOCK. He does not have to divide the question to vote it down. Let him vote it down in its entirety.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's argument, if carried to its full logical conclusion, would abolish the necessity of any rule, because this body, as a whole, could control.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have one decision which I would like to cite to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman goes to that, the Chair would like to ask him a question. The rule is that a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible. Let us see what we have here:

At the end of line 21, page 17, strike out "$49,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000," and add thereto the following.

Now, how far in this motion does that rule about striking out and insert apply?

Mr. MURDOCK. It must go to all of the inserted matter.

The SPEAKER. Let us see how much is inserted matter:

Strike out "$40,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000."

And then it says:

And add thereto the following.

And then comes the rest of the document.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, that is no more a part of the legislation than "I move to recommit."

The SPEAKER. Is what follows the word "and," namely, "add the following," a part of the matter you are inserting or is that something brand-new?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is part of the matter I am inserting.

The SPEAKER. You did not insert it in place of the $49,000,000?

Mr. MURDOCK. I strike out the "$49,000,000" and substitute "$48,500,000," with that addition.

The SPEAKER. It does not say that. It says "and add the following."

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know how we could have it otherwise, except to insert a semicolon or a colon or "provided."

The SPEAKER. So far as that difficulty is concerned, it could have been remedied very easily by making it run this way:

At the end of line 21, page 17, strike out "$49,000,000" and insert the following: "$48,500,000, provided"—

And so forth. There is no trouble about having it made right.

Mr. MURDOCK. It means precisely the same thing.

The SPEAKER. It means ultimately the same thing, but the Chair is talking about this rule of dividing the propositoin to strike out and insert. You have got to take all these rules and construe them together. Now the Chair will hear the gentleman's authorities.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the substance of the matter is just as the Speaker has recited it, and you might leave out those words "and add thereto," and leave a colon or a semicolon, or insert the word "provided," and it would have the same effect, and any change of any kind under the Speaker's suggestion would be one of verbiage, and not one changing the materiality of the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, the very question of verbiage is what determines whether it is in order or not. It is not what a man means, but what he says. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. For instance, this morning there was an amendment here that ran this way, in substance—the Chair does not try to quote the exact language: There were two propositions followed by one condition. Now, if you undertook to strike out the proposition to hold for naught the Executive order of 1910, then in order to eke out and make a whole proposition you had to jump the second proposition about repealing the order of 1912 and hitch onto the last end of it. Now, when you had done that you did not have any whole proposition left in the middle. It was up in the air, to use a military phrase. [Laughter.] So the Chair ruled it out of order. He ruled that there were not two substitutive propositions in it, and the Chair thinks he ruled correctly.

The question in this matter primarily is, What do you strike out, and what do you insert in place of what you did strike out?

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. In a moment. If you strike out "$49,000,000" and insert "$48,500,000," you can not divide that proposition; and then you add the following——

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, "add the following," immediately after the insertion of the $48,500,000.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, does my colleague yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. I suggest to the Speaker that the language used there means just the same thing as if you had said, "Also insert $48,500,000; also provided," and so forth. The language means the same thing. Certainly in ruling upon these questions the Chair will look at the substance of the amendment, and, to use the language of the Speaker, its ultimate effect, rather than the language in which the mere amendment is suggested on paper. The amendment as it reads, when inserted in the bill, will be just as the Speaker says—"$48,500,000: Provided," and so forth. The other language is the mere vehicle, the mere machinery, by which the committee is directed to perpetuate and accomplish the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Where is the authority that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the Speaker has had it cited to him, but I wanted to make sure. It is the decision of Chairman Carlisle, of Kentucky, in the railroad case in 1880. It can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1471.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas think that the case that Mr. Chairman Carlisle was deciding is a case similar to this?

Mr. MURDOCK. In part. It was a case where a sum—$9,480,000, for the transportation of the mails, just this same item in this bill—was, by amendment, reduced, with a direction to the Postmaster General to divert a portion of the remaining sum for a certain purpose.

The SPEAKER. Was it a direction to the Postmaster General or a permission to the Postmaster General?

Mr. MURDOCK. Strictly construed, it was a permission, because the word "may" was used.

The SPEAKER. In this case it is a positive direction, is it not? The language of the gentleman's motion is a positive direction.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, may I add just a word?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. I wanted to call the attention of the Speaker especially to the position taken by the Chairman yesterday in ruling upon this question in reference to the opinion of Mr. Speaker Carlisle. The amendment was very similar to this; very similar, indeed, with the one exception that the Speaker suggests; and the Chairman of the committee yesterday stated it so nicely that I can better state what I mean by reading it:

It is conceded that the first part of the amendment is in order under the Holman rule, as it carries a reduction of $500,000 in the appropriation. It is the opinion of the Chair that where a proposition of legislation follows a proposition to reduce the amount, and is so related to that proposition to reduce the amount as to be clearly and logically germane thereto, it is brought within the operation of the rule.

Now that was in substance what was held by Mr. Speaker Carlisle in that opinion, and this machinery that is provided here for the purpose of reducing the appropriation and reducing the amount to be paid out of the Treasury under the appropriation is appropriate machinery. It follows logically after the reduction of the amount of the appropriation, and no one can look at the amendment without seeing that it was intended for that purpose, and therefore it should not only be considered as a whole, but should be considered as an amendment on its face which reduces the amount of the appropriation and the expenditures to be paid out of the Treasury.

Now, as to the question that it is a direction to the Postmaster General, rather than the grant of an authority to use discretion, permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the Holman rule had any effect whatever, it is, as my colleague [Mr. MURDOCK] suggested, to permit to be introduced as a part of an appropriation bill a proposition to change legislation; and will it be contended that you may change legislation and make new law and yet not be able to control the discretion of an officer who acts under the law? That would be an absurdity—that you can change law and change the authority under which the officer acts and under which he is appointed, and yet not be able to change his discretion under the law. Of course, the opposite must follow; and if you can change the law you can change the discretion of the officer, under the Holman rule, which you can not do under the limitations placed upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS and Mr. HARDWICK rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] first and then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. That is the order in which they rose.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, the question of the controlling principle in the interpretation of the Holman rule is one of the utmost importance. It has been said in argument in connection with the pending parliamentary proposition, that the Holman rule must be construed strictly. I deny that absolutely. It has been ruled that this rule is one of beneficence, and on that account should be liberally construed, in order that its essential purpose may be carried out, and retrenchments effected.

It has also been suggested in the argument upon the Murdock amendment that if that interpretation is given to the rule which will make this amendment in order any tyro in the House can amend existing law by an amendment to an appropriation bill. This, Mr. Speaker, is the purpose of the Holman rule. If a tyro can work out any efficient scheme by which a substantial reduction of expenditures can be accomplished, he should not be debarred from attaching it to an appropriation bill. The purpose of the Holman rule is to afford to the tyro, and the expert alike the opportunity to bring his propositions before the House, passing in the first instance the scrutiny of the Chair who must be reasonably satisfied that they will effect a reduction of expenditures.

So that as I have said, the question of attitude is of the utmost importance in determining the proper construction of the Holman rule.

I desire more particularly to address myself to the Carlisle decision, because if I can understand the effect of a parliamentary precedent, this decision is absolutely in point, and decisive of this controversy.

The facts in the Carlisle ruling are as follows: A reduction of $10,000, was made in the aggregate appropriation. Coupled with this reduction of $10,000 an appropriation of $150,000 was authorized to maintain and secure certain necessary facilities for the postal service. As a result of this reduction in the appropriation, Mr. Chairman Carlisle held that the affirmative legislation disposing of $150,000, was in order. The amendment was as follows. For transportation on railroad routes $9,490,000 (instead of $9,500,000), of which sum $150,000 may be used by the Postmaster General to maintain and secure from the railroads necessary and special facilities for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.

It is suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the difference between this and the pending amendment is the word "direct" is used in the Murdock amendment while the words "may be used," occur in the amendment on which Mr. Chairman Carlisle made his ruling. This difference in the words used does not affect the value of the Carlisle precedent. Even if the Postmaster General was given discretion to use the $150,000 for the purposes indicated, this provision affording that discretion was none the less legislation. It was treated as legislation, and referred to as legislation by Mr. Carlisle who ruled that it was in order, though legislation, by virtue of the Holman rule and its relation to the reduction afforded. Permit me in this connection to read from the ruling:

For transportation on railroad routes——

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. SAUNDERS. This is from Mr. Carlisle's ruling. It is on page 1465 of the RECORD of yesterday.

For transportation on railroad routes, $9,490,000,

The reduction afforded being, as I have stated, merely $10,000. The legislation that follows, so far as I can see, is not related in anywise to the reduction. This fact makes a difference between this precedent, and the proposition that is presented to the Chair this evening, and therefore renders this precedent so much the more authoritative. For if the Carlisle ruling is good parliamentary law, I insist that the amendment now before the House must be in order. I will now read the legislative provision:

Of which sum $150,000 may be used by the Postmaster General to maintain and secure from railroads necessary and special facilities for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.

Note that this provision is in nowise the result of the reduction in the total of $9,500,000 nor does it effect that retrenchment. In the amendment that is before the Speaker, the legislation is considered to be the efficient cause of the reduction of $500,000. In the same connection the amount of $100,000 is set apart for certain things necessary to be done as a part of this concrete scheme. As soon as this reduction is effected by the operation of the legislation set out in the amendment, it is proper that the Post Office Department should take steps to ascertain the proper reduction to be made in the amounts that would otherwise be paid to the railroad companies. If the railroad companies as a result of this amendment will haul less mail matter of a second-class character, then of course the compensation of these companies should be reduced. Hence this legislation is vitally related to the legislation which effects the reduction. It is germane, and appropriate. The reducing legislation of the amendment, if I may so style it, is that legislation which forbids a vast mass of second-class matter of a certain character, to be transported in the mails. Now the legislation comprehended in the amendment on which Mr. Carlisle made his ruling, in other words, the disposition of the $150,000, had no sort of relation so far as I can see it, to the reduction of $10,000 in the aggregate appropriation.

It is a well-known fact that this second-class matter is carried at a loss. Hence the exclusion of a large mass of it from the mails will effect, as a matter of necessary consequence, a considerable saving, if an appropriate reduction is made in the compensation to be paid to the railroad companies. This reduction will be proper since the bulk of mail to be carried will be materially reduced. But it is insisted that on the whole it can not be determined whether a reduction will be effected, since the cost of making the inspections directed by the amendment can not be ascertained. This contention is not well taken. The department must make the inspection with the present force, and is not authorized to incur any additional liability. If the present force is inadequate to make a complete inspection, this will not authorize the employment of additional force, and no provision is made for additional force. Hence the cost of inspection will not be an additional cost, and can not be used to offset the positive reduction of $500,000. Whatever costs may be incurred in the use of the present force to make this inspection, will be trifling as compared with this sum of $500,000. Moreover if any portion of this mail matter will become first-class mail, as a result of this amendment, and necessarily it will, such mail will be carried at a profit, and this will be in addition to the saving of $500,000. Is the matter in the amendment ruled on by Mr. Carlisle, legislation? I will answer that query by reading from the ruling on page 1466. (Bear in mind that the point of order made to this amendment, was identical with the one under discussion, and under the same rule.)

Mr. Carlisle said:

Although the meaning of the words "necessary" and "special facilities for postal service" is not very clear, yet the Chair held yesterday, after giving the subject some consideration, that the effect of such an amendment would be to change existing law.

In other words whether, or not, this "may," is "must," or "shall," the provision is legislative, since the amendment changes existing law. In the light of this ruling what becomes of the suggestion that the pending amendment changes existing law by a positive direction, and is differentiated from the provision to which Mr. Carlisle's ruling was directed, because that provision contains the word "may."

So that, Mr. Speaker, we find that the legislative provision in Mr. Carlisle's ruling was held to be in order, because it was coupled with a reduction, though I fail to see the relation between the legislation and the reduction. In the present instance the legislation effects, and makes possible the consequent reduction. The language of the chairman in the ruling cited is:

So that the Chair is bound to hold that the amendment conforms strictly to the language of the rule. Taking the language of the rule as it stands, and putting upon it the construction which would ordinarily be put upon such language in a statute, or in a rule of the House, the Chair is compelled to hold that the amendment comes within the rule and is in order.

Look at the pending amendment for a moment. This amendment directs that certain mail matter shall not in the future be carried in the mails. Information afforded by the Post Office Department advises us that this matter is carried at a loss. Hence the less that is carried, the less the loss will be. As a result of not carrying this character of mail a reduction of $500,000 is made in the aggregate appropriation. Then follows the germane and appropriate provision that the sum of $100,000—I believe that is the amount—shall be used for the purpose of making certain ascertainments and certain abatements in connection with the transportation of this class of matter by the railway companies.

So Mr. Speaker I return to my original proposition that unless the ruling of Mr. Carlisle can be overthrown, and the facts in the case to which that ruling relates render its authority particularly impressive in the present instance, then this amendment is in order, and the point of order should be overruled.

The same conclusion will be reached upon a just consideration of the Holman rule, apart from the Carlisle precedent. It is not pretended that a reduction can be made in the amount of an appropriation, and upon that as a peg, may be hung unrelated propositions of affirmative legislation. A point of order may be properly directed to such legislation. But it is insisted that if affirmative legislation effects the consequent reduction in the appropriation, wherever that appropriation may occur, then such legislation is in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I think everybody participating in this debate concedes that under the guise of a motion to recommit, no proposition can be submitted to the House that would not be in order under the general rules of the House if submitted as an amendment. Therefore if a motion to recommit contains matter that as an amendment would be out of order if offered in the House in that form, it could not be correctly submitted to the House in this form.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the question that the Speaker is called upon to decide is one absolutely settled by eminent authority and in exactly the opposite way from that contended for by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] and others who take that view of the case.

I find that on the 9th of February, 1893, Mr. Dingley, of Maine, offered this amendment in the House of Representatives.

The Clerk read as follows:

Court of Claims: For salaries of five judges of the Court of Claims, at $4,500 each; chief clerk, $3,000; one assistant clerk, $2,000; bailiff, $1,500; four clerks, at $1,200 each; and one messenger—in all, $34,640.

Mr. Dingley offered an amendment to this provision, as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the words "one thousand five hundred dollars," in line 6, on page 107, and insert: "Three clerks at $1,200 each, and one messenger; in all, $33,440: Provided, That so much of an act 'to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government,' approved March 3, 1883, as authorizes any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives to refer any claim against the Government to the Court of Claims, is hereby repealed."

Mr. Enloe made a point of order on that amendment that it changed existing law and did not reduce expenditures.

Mr. Dingley said:

The amendment is entirely within the exception to the rule. While it does change the existing law, to the extent of repealing so much of the so-called "Bowman Act" as authorizes a committee of either House to send a case to the Court of Claims, yet it does reduce expenditures to the extent of one clerk who is required to attend to that work in the Court of Claims, and reduces the amount of the bill to the extent of that salary. It is brought specifically within the rule.

I will not read the balance of this, except that which seems to appertain to this question.

Now, Mr. Holman, who was the author of the rule now under consideration, participated in this debate, and I want to read you his view. He took the opposite side from Mr. Dingley, and contended that none of this proposition was in order. Mr. Holman said:

That leaves only one question to be considered, and that is this: Does it, as a matter of fact, reduce expenditures by reducing the number of employees of the Government? As it does that, the only question is whether the subsequent provision is necessary to carry that provision into effect.

Now, I concede that you can not arbitrarily by striking out a word and inserting a provision not connected with the proposition make an act of independent legislation. I agree that you can not do that. The repealing force of the provision must be for the purpose of accomplishing the prior object of reduction. Under the third clause of Rule XXI, you can legislate in one of three ways or for one of three objects; first, reducing the number or compensation of officers provided for in the bill; second, reducing the salary or compensation of any employee of the Government; or, third, reducing the amount carried by the bill.

Mr. Blanchard, of Louisiana, used this language referring to a ruling made by him as chairman of the Committee of the Whole House during the previous session of the same Congress:

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have not the words that were proposed to be stricken out, but I will read the amendment again. It was in the following language:

"Strike out after the word 'cents,' in line 18, down to the words 'ninety-three,' in line 23, and insert as follows:

"'An the act entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce," approved March 3, 1891, is hereby repealed.'"

Mr. HOLMAN. But the important question is, in that connection, as to the language proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I did not know what words were stricken out. I have not the bill before me. I will, however, again read for the benefit of the gentleman from Indiana the ruling of the Chairman on the point of order then raised, in which he said that the amendment contained two substantive propositions, one of which would be in order under the rule, the other would not, and that the first part being in order, and the second not in order, made the whole amendment obnoxious to the rule, and, viewing it as a whole, it was not in order and could not be entertained.

Now, in deciding this question, Chairman Richardson used this language:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the amendment certainly covers two substantive propositions. One is in order and retrenches expenditures in the manner provided in the rule. The other does not. The amendment, therefore, is obnoxious to the rule, because the latter clause is obnoxious, but it may be divided if the gentleman sees fit to divide it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course, if a part of my amendment is out of order, the whole of it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. If the gentleman proposed to accomplish simply the repeal of the Bowman Act by a provision in the appropriation bill, it seems to the Chair that he would be compelled to hold immediately that it was not in order. Now, when he seeks to couple with it a reduction of the employees of the Government, with a view of making the latter part of it within the rule, it seems to the Chair it can not be done.

If this can be done, then the whole internal-revenue law could be repealed in this appropriation bill; because the bill provides for paying some of the employees or clerical force of the Internal-Revenue Service. Now, if the gentleman moved to strike out the appropriation for one clerk in that bureau, he could, if this amendment is in order, hang upon that a provision repealing the internal-revenue law and other laws where clerical forces are appropriated for in this bill.

Now, I want to call the Speaker's attention to one or two observations on the propositions involved. It seems to me the first substantive proposition in the motion to recommit is clearly in order, for it comes within the first object of the Holman rule, in that it provides in so many figures a reduction of the appropriation carried in the bill. But it seems to me the second proposition, where you strike out and insert and add a proviso, is not in order, because it does not necessarily mean, and can not be held by the Chair to mean, a reduction in expenditure, standing by itself.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, it is clearly legislation and a violation of the rule of the House, unless saved by the Holman rule. Take the case decided by the gentleman from Virginia, the Carlisle decision, and it seems to me the decision in that case, Mr. Speaker, can be clearly differentiated from the question now pending.

In the case ruled upon by Mr. Chairman Carlisle, there was no old law repealed and there was no new law made. Whatever may have been the language used, obiter dictum, by the distinguished gentleman, it was not a change of existing law. In that case no statute of the United States was repealed by the proviso that was held in order, and no new statute was made. A discretion was merely given to an executive officer to do a certain thing if he thought best to do it.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say to the contention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] that in that kind of a statute the word "may" has been generally construed by the courts to mean "shall"?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the general rule. Certainly not unless the context forces such a construction. The Postmaster General may use an appropriation in a certain way. He is not forced to do it. The use or adoption of the legislative provision may influence him in determining what his policy ought to be, but if Congress does not order him to do it, in so many words, I do not believe that follows as a matter of course that the law is necessarily changed. Therefore I say that this proposition can not be held to be in order under the precedents in the Fifty-second Congress, and there are no precedents anywhere else that necessarily conflict with these precedents unless each and every substantive proposition—not only the first motion to strike out $49,000,000 and insert $48,500,000 in lieu thereof, but also to insert the proviso, making two other separate and distinct substantive propositions—be held to be in order, and they can not be held to be in order, because the second proposition is not necessarily, and no presiding officer can so hold it to be, a retrenchment. Standing alone, it does not mean retrenchment, and the third substantive proposition is clearly and solely legislative.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say about the proposition that the whole of this paper is to be inserted in lieu of the words stricken out?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; because the amendment on its face provides otherwise. It strikes out "$49,000,000" and inserts in lieu thereof "$48,500,000," and then proposes to add a proviso in addition to that. It strikes out and inserts, and then adds a proviso. It seems to me it has not been drawn in the most skillful way in which it could have been drawn.

Mr. Speaker, I have about concluded what I want to say, except this: This language can not be saved as being nonlegislative. It clearly changes the law. No presiding officer can say that this second substantive proposition standing alone, construed by itself, would necessarily or even probably mean a reduction of expenditure, and why? Because no man can calculate whether the amount of inspection necessary would not be more than the amount saved from the diminution in the amount of second-class mail matter, which is unprofitable, and no man can tell to what extent the first-class mail, which is profitable, would be affected. So, if it be true, as ruled by these distinguished gentlemen in the second session of the Sixty-second Congress, Messrs. Blanchard and Richardson, that all these substantive propositions must come within the Holman rule or else the whole motion is subject to the point of order, then I contend that the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to recommit is clearly out of order. It seems to me that no other ruling can possibly be made by the Speaker.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will indulge me, I would like to read another decision, which I think is directly in point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman after he hears the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly these instructions might have been drawn in the form of a single proposition to strike out and insert, which would not have been divisible, but they are not so drawn. To my mind the motion embraces at least three separate and distinct propositions, first, the motion to strike out "$49,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000." That is the motion to strike out and insert, and is the only motion to strike out and insert that there is in the proposition. It stops there, so far as any suggestion to strike out and insert is concerned. Then follows another proposition to "add the following," namely, a provision that no part of the money expended shall be used for the transportation of certain matter under certain circumstances. I am inclined to think that second provision is in the nature of a limitation. If in order at all it is in order as a limitation. But we then come to the third proposition, which is a separate and distinct proposition in the paper as drawn, that $100,000 shall be expended by the Postmaster General in determining certain things, which he is not now required or authorized to determine. That provision clearly changes existing law and is out of order, unless it is saved by the Holman rule.

The Holman bill has been read, and I shall not repeat it. It applies only where there is a reduction in the amount of the expenditure provided by the bill or a reduction in the salaries or compensation provided for in the bill. Does this proposition to expend $100,000 show upon its face that its necessary effect will be a reduction in the expenses of the Government or in the amount that would have to be expended under the bill? I submit that it would be impossible for the Chair to find in that provision, as worded, any language or any thought from which the Chair or anybody else could definitely determine that the expenditure of that $100,000 would reduce the expenses of the Government to the extent of a single cent. It would be a mere matter of conjecture. There is nothing on the face of the paper to show any reduction whatever. The only definite thing about it would be the expenditure of $100,000. There is certainly no clear provision for the reduction of any expenses or the amount to be paid to any person in salary or for any other purpose. If, as I suggest, that third proposition is out of order, then it follows that the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] must be sustained, because it is made against this whole motion; and if any part of it is out of order, the whole must fall. If the point of order should be overruled, then I submit the motion would be divisible into three parts; but if, as I contend, the third proposition is out of order, then the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky must be sustained.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-second Congress, on June 2, 1892, in the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill the following amendment was offered by Mr. Bergen:

Amend, by adding, on page 3, line 9, after the word "dollars," the following: "That when a new post office is established the Postmaster General shall immediately provide for a mail route to such office and shall make contract for carrying mail to such office, and that after providing by general advertisement for the transportation of the mails in any State or Territory, as authorized by law, the Postmaster General may secure any mail service that may become necessary before the next general advertisement for said State or Territory by posting notices for a period of not less than 10 days in the post offices at the terminal of any route to be let."

And so forth. It then goes on dealing with the contract. To that a point of order was made and sustained. The gentleman then offered the same amendment, with this addition:

And the appropriation herein for star routes is hereby reduced $500.

It was contended when he offered his first amendment that it was not in order because it changed existing law, and that it did not come under the Holman rule, because it did not reduce expenditures, and the Chair so ruled. Thereupon, in order to get within the Holman rule, Mr. Bergen reoffered it, and added the lines I have just read, namely, "the appropriation herein for star routes is hereby reduced $500."

He then argued that inasmuch as there was a reduction, it was in order under the Holman rule. A point of order was again made, and the Chair sustained the point of order, holding that you could not by simply tying it to this reduction make it in order. Thereupon an appeal was taken to the House, and the Chair was sustained by a vote of 73 ayes as against 21 noes.

Now, the only difference between that proposition and this is that here we start in by reducing the amount and then bring in other faulty legislation, whereas there he started out with faulty legislation and then added a provision to reduce the amount.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will look at the bottom of the first page where that amendment was introduced by Mr. Bergen, he will find Mr. Lind's name at the end of the second column, and turning over to the next page he will find Mr. Lind directly says that this will result in a retrenchment, in his opinion, to which the Chair says that, although Mr. Lind may be correct in his opinion, it has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is quite right. The language is this:

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this point of order is well taken, for the reason that the existing law, as I understand it, limits the amount that may be expended for a star-route service in the first instance, after the establishment of it, to two-thirds of the revenue. This simply substitutes a general power under the law to let a contract. Now, is the Chair going to assume as a matter of law and fact that two-thirds of the revenue of a new office is less than the amount that it would take under a letting to competitive bidders. The Chair can not assume, as a matter of law, that it would carry more money than the existing law. My contention is that it would carry less. That is all I have to suggest. The Chair can not rule that it would increase expenditures. I contend that it will economize and save expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether it will increase or decrease expenditures. There is nothing on the face of the amendment to show whether it will or not; but it changes existing law, and in the absence of a direct expression on the face of the bill to show that it would decrease expenditures under the rule, the Chair will have to sustain the point of order.

Mr. LIND. I desire to make that expression to the Chair. I give it as my judgment, that it would result in a saving to the Government.

Mr. BLOUNT. Regular order.

Mr. LIND. I think my opinion is entitled to some weight with the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota may be entirely correct in his opinion, but there is nothing on the face of the amendment to show——

Mr. BLOUNT. I insist on the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

And that is the exact situation here to-day.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, there is a fundamental difference between the present case and the case stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. He quoted the language of the then chairman, stating that a mere opinion on the part of a Member could not be taken as final. This case is different. It is not a question of opinion here. It is self-evident on its face irrespective of any strained opinion. Now, to start with, we are operating under the Holman rule.

The SPEAKER. Now, what is it that is plain?

Mr. HOBSON. I will show to the Speaker. I am going to start at the bottom. It is, that on its face this amendment would reduce the expenditures of the Government. Now, I contend it must be admitted that that is the whole question at issue, not a matter of opinion but a matter of evident fact whether the provision reduces the cost of the service to the Government or not. And if it does, it comes under the Holman rule; all the citations to the contrary notwithstanding. There is a fundamental difference between this and any case thus far cited, in none of which was it evident that the cost would be reduced. Now, to start with, even where the latter part of this amendment provides $100,000 to be used by the Postmaster General for certain purposes, what are those purposes? For the purpose of weighing the mail and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid to the railway companies for transporting the mails, by excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman whether or not that last proposition on the face of it shows that there would be a reduction?

Mr. HOBSON. It does. I am coming to that.

The SPEAKER. How does it show it?

Mr. HOBSON. Because it does not take as much to pay an inspector to change the weighing and readjust the weighing and accounting as is involved in the weighing itself, or change in the bulk of the material.

The SPEAKER. I will ask the gentleman this question: How can anybody even guess the cost of examining the mails to see whether this prohibited matter is in the mails or not?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I will come to that later.

The SPEAKER. All right.

Mr. HOBSON. In this particular part the provision for meeting the expenses of readjustment could not equal the adjustment and its saving. It is plain that the money required to determine the readjustments can not be as much as the saving from the readjustment itself. That is self-evident in all business operations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman claim that he can come anywhere near guessing how many pounds of mail matter and letters would be eliminated by this provision if it were enacted into law?

Mr. HOBSON. No; I can not guess; but I can say this: The cost to determine it, no matter what it were, would not be commensurate with the amount involved or the cost saved to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman says that. For the sake of determining this question, I deny it.

Mr. HOBSON. Well, I submit, on the face of it, that in any system of business in the world the inspection is never as expensive as the system itself; that the amount of the Government's payments to its employees incident to the operation of its mail service in that regard is not equal to the amount that would be saved or to the amount that would be returned because of the reduced volume of mail, because if the employees now engaged attended to the work the expense would not be to any appreciable degree greater, and if they were not required to devote their full time to it on account of the reduced volume of mail, the Government would not need to have as many employees. The department would either reduce the number of employees or else it would more than save the additional expense involved by the employment of the same number or even a slightly increased number.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman that he is in error in some instances in reference to the cost of inspection, the service itself frequently being less in cost than the cost of inspection. Does the gentleman know that we are now inspecting some post offices in the United States at a cost of $40 or $50 a year when those offices are not yielding $5 at a profit?

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to the gentleman also that it does not require the full services of the inspector to inspect those post offices; that the cost of inspection of post offices is less than the revenues derived from the post offices; that the cost of inspecting the revenue service, for example, is less than the revenues that come as the result of that inspection. And I assert that, on the face of it, you can readjust the force required for inspection until it is far below the amount of the Government business involved and the revenues derived. That is self-evident. Now, we will pass to the next point.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. If we assume that the inspection will involve the opening of all letters and newspaper packages that go through the post offices, then how about the inspection?

Mr. HOBSON. I will come to that now. I have been discussing the $100,000 authorization, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Does the gentleman assume that the passage of this amendment would reduce the amount of mail to be transported by the Government?

Mr. HOBSON. Very largely.

Mr. OLMSTED. Where does the gentleman find any authority for that proposition?

Mr. HOBSON. That appears on the face of it.

Mr. OLMSTED. But by this legislation you would simply prohibit the papers from carrying certain advertisements.

Mr. HOBSON. I will ask the gentleman if he imagines for a minute that these advertisements would be mailed if they were not transported?

Mr. OLMSTED. I will say to the gentleman that the newspapers under this amendment would simply eliminate the advertisements, but the papers can go through the mails just the same.

Mr. HOBSON. I am familiar with that matter. There is not a postmaster in my district but knows, just as soon as the mail bag is opened, just what the liquor advertisement is. He throws those papers over in a pile and waits before distributing them until he finishes distributing the other mail. It would not require any additional inspection; but if it did, the saving would amount to more than the cost of inspection on the face of it.

Now I will come to the general question of the opening of the mails. This, Mr. Speaker, is not anything new. The Federal Government is constantly giving supervision, through the existing machinery of the Post Office Department, over the matters that pass through the mails. There are all kinds of matter that are being excluded to-day from the mails, and matter of that kind has to be inspected in order to ascertain whether it is legal or not. This would not increase hardly by one employee in a town big as any town in my district—in a town as big as Birmingham—the force that would be required.

I do not believe that in its actual working it could possibly require one additional person in the machinery of the service. The same inspections would be made that are being now made, only the inspectors would be on the lookout for new kinds of illegal matter. The methods of inspection would not be changed while the volume of work would be materially reduced. I know that.

This kind of matter enters the mail at certain well-defined points. It enters the mail at the centers that do the shipping of these goods into the "dry" territory, and it would scarcely require an additional detective in the service of the Post Office Department to locate any of these centers of shipment that were trying to send this kind of matter illegally through the mails.

On the very face of it the exclusion of this kind of matter reduces largely, substantially, the volume of the mail, and does not require any new machinery of inspection. In its operation it is not parallel at all to the establishment of new routes or new post offices as in the cases cited. I repeat that on its face it would curtail the amount of matter in the mails, and would not appreciably increase the machinery that is required for its operation, on the face of it. There is no kind of argument and there is no amount of citation of precedents that can change the simple fact that the cost of transporting the mails of the United States every year would be substantially less, and that the readjustment of that cost would not involve new machinery of any appreciable magnitude, and its cost can not be considered as commensurate with the material saving of cost in the volume of mail. This question of order should not be decided on any technicality; but on the simple, plain, evident fact borne on the very face of the amendment, that there would be self-evident reduction in the expense of the mail service of the Government, and therefore this amendment must come, without any hair splitting, without any straining, without any violence under the Holman rule.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to enter into any lengthy discussion of this point of order. It has been so clearly and lucidly presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] that it is hardly necessary for me to go into the details of that discussion. I approve very fully what they have said, but I want to touch on just a few points in this discussion, in order to call them to the attention of the Speaker in reaching his conclusion. Of course, we all understand that it is a violation of the rules of this House to offer on an appropriation bill any new legislation. That rule applies in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It applies here. If this is not new legislation, then it is in order, in my opinion.

Now, is it new legislation? It is conceded, and I need not argue that question, that, taken as a proposition standing alone, it is not germane, perhaps, to this bill and is new legislation, in that it provides and gives direction to the department, changing the law and changing the discretion of the department on this subject in the mails.

Now, that being conceded, what is there to take it out of the rule that it is new legislation? It is answered that it comes under the general rule of the House and is in order, although new legislation, because it is a limitation upon the appropriation or a reduction of the appropriation, and therefore in order under the Holman rule. Well, if the gentlemen are right about that contention, then it is in order. Take that side of the case to begin with and let us discuss it. Let us see whether or not it is in order under the Holman rule. The purpose of that rule was to produce a substantial reduction in the expenses of the Government. How was that to be determined by the Chair? From the facts apparent in the amendment proposed. Now, how are you going to determine that? Is it to be a mere recital of the figures that happened to be used on the face of an amendment, or is the whole text and subject matter of the amendment to be taken together to determine whether there is a substantial reduction or not?

Suppose this amendment had provided that the figures $49,000,000 should be stricken out and $48,500,000 inserted instead, and it had then provided that for the purpose of obtaining better facilities under this section the mail trains should be run on every trunk line in the United States 10 times a day. There you would have a case, where on the face of the amendment, there was a reduction in the actual appropriation proposed, and yet the Chair would have to call into requisition his common sense and his knowledge of the department and of the law generally to ascertain whether, taking the whole amendment, there would be any reduction or not, and you would at once reach the conclusion that the reduction of the figures from $49,000,000 to $48,500,000 was a fraud attempted to be practiced upon the House for the purpose of incorporating into that amendment legislation that was in violation of the rules of the House of Representatives, and the point of order would promptly be sustained.

Now, take this amendment. Apply the same common sense to it—and I have no reflection to make upon the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. He indicates very clearly, though, a want of information as to the conduct of the Post Office Department when he says that it would put no additional expense upon that department to carry out the terms of this amendment. Let us see.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I meant, and I thought I said, to an appreciable difference in proportion to the amount.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Have it that way. Let us see whether it is an appreciable difference or not. Here is $500,000 proposed to be stricken out and another $100,000 to be used in certain adjustments of weights, making a net of $400,000 saving. Let us see if that is a real reduction on the face of the amendment. Take up the operation of it, and let us see what the policy of the department must be. Here are closed pouches of mail; they are put on at every station along every road in the United States; they are delivered from station to station. It would take an inspector on every train in the United States, traveling the whole time, opening mail pouches and ascertaining whether in magazines, in newspapers, in letters, or in any other way, there were advertisements of this character.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, yes; I will yield again.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman explain to the House or the Chair how the present laws relating to obscene matter and matters coming under the lottery law are administered?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That comes through the inspectors' department, and ninety-nine times in one hundred it comes in information furnished from the outside to the inspectors' department; and then the inspectors are put to work to make a case, and nine times out of ten it costs the Government ten times what it ought to cost. That is after the matter has passed through the mails, too.

Let me go further. Every steamboat line in the United States, every electric car line, every star route, and the 42,000 rural routes may carry mail containing these advertisements. Let there be an inspector to carry out the purpose of this amendment on all of them, and it does not take a man with any sense at all to see that it would add $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 of money annually to the cost and expense of the Post Office Department of the United States.

Again, what else have you got to do? These inspectors have got, in each and every one of these cases, to make their examination and reject the matter, and of necessity, in the readjustment of mail rates, it would take a new weigher on every road, for the parties interested and the Government, and there would arise contests on almost every railroad in the United States.

The question arises as to the power of the Department. There would be endless trouble and litigation. There could not have been conceived an amendment which would bring more trouble, more annoyance and disturbance to the Government, and greater expense to it than this very amendment. The Chair, of course, sees, and everybody knows, that it is not the purpose of this amendment to accomplish any good in an orderly and decent manner in the affairs of the department, but it is the exploitation of a question that unfortunately ought not to be in the politics of this country, brought upon the floor on a bill that of all others ought to be free from any such thing.

Mr. HOBSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat may I ask him another question? Will he point out wherein this matter excluded from the mail would be different in the matter of inspection from other matters excluded and for which inspection exists?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Because every single magazine, newspaper, and letter would have to be hunted to look for these advertisements, and you would have to look at every advertisement in them.

Mr. HOBSON. Why is this matter any different from obscene matter?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The obscene matter is not looked for in any such way. There is no statute that requires inspectors or people to hunt it up. There is no statute like this proposed amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Does the gentleman say there is no provision about it?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is a matter that never comes to the department unless it is called to their attention by some one in the nature of a prosecutor. I want to say right now that there is a whole lot of work there done by the department along that line just to give employment to inspectors who are practically useless.

Mr. HOBSON. Then those inspectors could be used for this purpose.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, no. Your inspectors ought to be reduced.

Mr. HOBSON. Suppose they were reduced; would not that bring about a reduction in cost, if the volume of the mail were less?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You could not, to save your soul, find what the difference in the mail matter would be, outside of this question of inspection and report, until you had actually had all the mails weighed.

Mr. HOBSON. There would not be a post office in my district where the mail would not be reduced and reduced every day.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman is so used to going after these circulars that he could dig them out of every hole and corner.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As to the obscene matter and lottery matter, is not there a prohibition against its mailing?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; there is a penalty attached to that.

Mr. MANN. Is there any provision in the law which forbids the payment to the transportation companies for carrying that mail matter if it is carried?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. None whatever; one is a penal provision and the other is a different provision. I want to say another thing to the Chair. It has been suggested that this is a direct statute and not a mandatory statute. The gentleman from Virginia has said that the courts construe the word "shall" to mean "may." He will not find anywhere that the courts ever made any such construction except where they took the whole context of the statute, and it was determined that the legislators intended that such should be the construction.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The context is appealed to to determine whether "may" shall be construed as "shall"?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is often.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the context here:

For transportation, $9,290,000; of which sum $150,000 may be used by the Postmaster General to maintain and secure from railroads necessary facilities, etc.

Do not the words "necessary facilities" clearly show that "may" must be "shall"?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has got to construe it in connection with what goes before.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Construe it as a whole.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The argument is fallacious. No lawyer believes that that statute is intended to be directory; its language is mandatory and complete. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say even this much, and I beg the pardon of the House for taking up so much time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, either the gentleman from Alabama has failed to catch the point of the decision cited by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHEELEY] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] or else he fails to follow the Holman rule to its complete conclusion. The gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Georgia have shown that a provision obnoxious to, or subject to a point or order under, the Holman rule would not be relieved of that point of order by tacking onto it a reduction in the appropriation. The decision which they cited, as it seemed to me, was clear and complete on that point. Now, if that decision be correct it is entirely immaterial whether the proviso of this amendment which is now under consideration reduces expenditure or not, because that proviso is not admissible under the Holman rule. It is not sufficient where the amendment is introduced by an individual Member, and not by a committee, that it should retrench expenditure; it must reduce the number of officers, their salaries, or it must reduce the total amount of the expenditure.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. HOBSON. Does not the gentleman recognize that the Government pays for the amount of mail transported, and that if that amount is clearly reduced the sum the Government is to pay is reduced whether they have the same number of employees or a less number?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman think that if he introduces an amendment to this bill that reduces the expenditure, that that is all he has to do to bring it under the Holman rule?

Mr. HOBSON. I believe that if an amendment does substantially reduce the expenses of the Government it comes under the Holman rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman does not represent the Post Office Committee. The Post Office Committee is the one that can introduce an amendment of that kind and bring it under the Holman rule. If the gentleman, as a Member of the House, introduces an amendment, he has got to go further than that and show that the amendment reduces the number of salaries and the officers of the United States and reduces the compensation of the persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States or by the reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill.

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; a reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman still fails to appreciate the point of the decision cited by the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know that I could move to strike out the sum in the bill and substitute a lesser sum before the Holman rule was adopted? Is he aware of that fact, that it was in order to strike out the sum and insert a lesser sum without any Holman rule?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I will not discuss that question with the gentleman after he has undertaken to show that this did apply and was governed by the Holman rule. I do not care to go into a discussion of such a matter. The gentleman is evading the question.

Mr. MURDOCK. I was going to follow that by asking the gentleman the question if I can strike out the sum and put in a lesser sum without the benefit of the Holman rule, what does the Holman rule stand me for unless it enables me to do something besides that which I could do before? That is a legitimate question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That does not apply to new legislation. The gentleman has brought in new legislation, and is undertaking to justify it on the ground that it reduces expenditures, and I say it does not bring it under the Holman rule, that he has to bring in a separate provision before the proviso in order to make it admissible under the decision cited by the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Georgia.

I wish to show to the Chair how easy it would be to nullify the Holman rule if this position, which is the one contended for by the gentleman from Kansas, is to be sustained. Suppose the gentleman wants to introduce new legislation as to how money shall be expended, and on an appropriation bill. If his contention is sustained all he has to do is to tack in front of it a statement that the total amount is reduced by $500 or $200, and it all comes in. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purpose of the provision, so far as that is concerned, but I am also interested in the orderly procedure of the House under its rules and that new legislation shall not be illegally introduced into appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. This debate upon this point of order has been very illuminating. In the opinion of the Chair in order to get new legislation into a bill under the provisions of the Holman rule, the proposed legislation should very clearly do one of the things stated in the rule, which provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair permit an interruption there in order that I may make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. And that is whether the word "person" would be interpreted to include a corporation?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. I assumed that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in order to bring a proposition under that rule it ought to clearly do one of those three things.

There are two or three rules involved in this proposition. The Chair has just stated one of them. The other is that a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible. The third one is that if part of an amendment is bad it vitiates the entire amendment. The fourth is that you can not do anything by way of amendment in a motion to recommit that you could not do in the Committee of the Whole by way of amendment.

As to the first proposition—the Holman rule—after hearing all of these arguments and examining the matter carefully from time to time, the Chair does not believe that anyone can assert positively that this whole proposition taken together would reduce the expenditures of the Government. On the face of it it reduces it $500,000, but no mortal man can even guess how much money it would require to enforce the first half of that proviso. The Chair can not do it, and the Chair takes it that no Member can tell the method of procedure under that first half of the proviso. Whether the inspectors would undertake to inspect all the letters that go through the mail and all the documents and all the magazines and all of the newspapers the Chair does not know. The Chair does know that if the inspectors undertook any such thing as that it would cost a good deal more than $500,000 a year. That would work an increase rather than a decrease in expenditures in that behalf.

Passing that over, the rule against dividing a proposition to strike out and insert applies to this motion to recommit. The essential parts of it are as follows:

At the end of line 21, page 17, strike out "$49,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$48,500,000," and add thereto the following.

The Chair believes that the proposition to strike out and insert applies only to that portion of it ending with the figures "$48,500,000." This motion to recommit could have been so drawn that it would have brought itself within the rule that a proposition to strike out and insert is not divisible, but the paper is not so drawn. Therefore the proposition down to the end of "$48,500,000" can not be divided. But the motion is susceptible of being divided into three parts, and the part just mentioned is clearly in order. If that stood alone, of course there could not be any two opinions about that.

But following the proposition to strike out $49,000,000 and insert $48,500,000 there are two separate propositions, neither one of which standing alone, in the judgment of the Chair, comes within the provisions of the Holman rule. Here is the first proposition:

And by adding thereto:

"Provided, That no part of such appropriation shall be used in transporting mail matter consisting in any part of any letter, circular, packet, newspaper, magazine, or other periodical advertising for sale, either directly or indirectly, any spirituous, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors for transmission to or delivery in any State, county, municipality wherein the sale of such liquors is or may be hereafter prohibited by State law."

Clearly, you can not tell and the Chair can not tell whether the circumstance of enforcing that proposition would be greater than the amount saved or not.

The third proposition is:

That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to use $100,000 of this appropriation for the purpose of weighing the mail and readjusting and reducing the compensation now paid to railway companies for transporting the mails by excluding said classes of mail matter from the mails of the United States.

If that had been tacked on as a proviso at the end of the figures "$48,500,000," it would not have been in order, because it is a direction to an officer as to what he shall do. It is not a limitation. Clearly, it is new legislation and increases the total amount appropriated. The first of the propositions obnoxious to the rule as matters stand would be in order provided anybody could ascertain that the reduction would be greater than the increase.

So if the motion to recommit is to be considered as a whole, the Chair would have to rule it out. The Chair is willing to have the gentleman from Kansas withdraw his motion to recommit, strike out the obnoxious parts, if he chooses, and submit the part that is in order.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Chair refers to the two latter propositions as being obnoxious.

The SPEAKER. Yes. Taking it as a whole, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following motion to recommit with instructions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from Indiana opposed to the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. CULLOP. I am.

Mr. MANN. I just wanted to see whether the gentleman would say he was.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The Chair thanks the gentleman for making the suggestion. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CULLOP moves to recommit, with instructions to report the bill forthwith with the following amendment, at end of line 24, on page 22, by inserting "That the Executive order of date of October 15, 1912, and all previous Executive orders whereby postmasters of the fourth class are placed in the classified service, are hereby annulled and revoked."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. The motion of the gentleman is not in order under the rule. It is clearly legislation.

The SPEAKER. There is not any question on earth about this being out of order. [Laughter.] It is new legislation pure and simple. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWN, for four days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. GEORGE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27941) the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HAY. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may continue for three hours, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. And pending that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that general debate be confined to three hours on the bill, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman that if the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union now, after the first reading of the bill is dispensed with, he expects to move to rise?

Mr. HAY. To move to rise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 27941, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Clerk report the bill by title.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to go into a discussion of the bill this evening. Therefore I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 27941, the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore, to join a committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to attend memorial services for Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, to be held at Ann Arbor, Mich., on January 26, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

In compliance with the foregoing resolution the President pro tempore appointed as said committee Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. JONES, Mr. KENYON, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. POMERENE.

SENATE BILL AND A JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and a joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 8000. An act providing for publicity in taking evidence under the act of July 2, 1890; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution appropriating $40,000 for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate; to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 20339. A bill for the relief of Joseph W. McCall.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HUBBARD.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 9th day of February, 1913, at 12 o'clock m., be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, late a Representative from the State of Iowa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

There was no objection.

The order was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, January 15, 1913, at 12 o'clock m.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE (S. DOC. NO. 1009).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $20,000 to enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to carry out the provisions of the act approved August 23, 1912, relating to investigations concerning the cost of producing articles dutiable in the United States and leading countries where such articles are produced, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE CHESAPEAKE & POTOMAC TELEPHONE CO. (H. DOC. NO. 1270).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. for the year 1912, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 109) authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. FERRIS, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 20339) for the relief of Joseph W. McCall, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

He also presented a report of a special committee of the Georgetown Citizens' Association relative to assessment and taxation of property in the District, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRISTOW presented petitions of sundry citizens of Altoona, Langton, and Alden, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURNHAM presented resolutions adopted by the congregations of the Baptist, Congregational, and Methodist churches of Newport, N. H., favoring the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the Commercial Club of Mankato, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation transferring the control of the national forests to the several States, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Local Union No. 412, United Mine Workers of America, of Hymera, Ind., favoring the passage of the so-called Clayton contempt bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES presented resolutions adopted by the Columbia and Snake River Waterways Association, Idaho State League of Commercial Bodies, Idaho-Washington Development League, the Commercial Club of Lewiston, Idaho, and of the Chamber of Commerce of Clarkston, Wash., favoring an appropriation for the completion of the Celilo Canal and the improvement of the Columbia and Snake Rivers, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PERKINS presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., and resolutions adopted by the Southern California Wholesale Grocers' Association, remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHIVELY presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Marion, Elwood, Noblesville, South Bend, and Wolf Lake, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of H. J. Evans, C. V. Mull, J. W. Bucks, E. Shanafelt, D. Glasgow, George Beyler, G. E. Mangun, and 176 other citizens of South Bend, and of the congregation and Sunday School of the First Reformed Church of South Bend, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the repeal of the law providing for the closing of post offices on Sunday, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Orion, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon red-light injunction bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Muskegon, Arbela, and Hillsdale, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND (for Mr. SMITH of Michigan) presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Onaway, Mich., and a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Ann Arbor, Mich., remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PENROSE presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen of the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WATER POWER AND TRANSMISSION LINES (S. DOC. NO. 1008).

Mr. SMOOT. I present the permit to the Great Falls Power Co. for a transmission line and the agreement between that company and the Government of the United States. I ask that the agreement be printed as a public document, and in this connection I have a certain number of newspaper clippings bearing upon the matter that I request be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator kindly restate his proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that the Secretary of the Interior sent me a copy of the permit issued to the Great Falls Power Co. by the Secretary of the Interior for a transmission line over certain public lands. There have been calls for copies of the agreement from all parts of the country, and the Secretary of the Interior desires that it be made a public document. I therefore ask that it be printed as a public document, excluding, however, the price agreed upon between the power company and the railway company.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it is the Great Falls of the Potomac?

Mr. SMOOT. No; of Montana.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator from Utah why not print the whole agreement?

Mr. SMOOT. I have asked that the whole agreement be printed except the rate to be paid per kilowatt per hour.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Why not print the rate?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary thought there may be objections on the part of the companies to having it printed.

Mr. ROOT. I should think there are obvious reasons for having it printed, being an agreement between this company and the Government of the United States, or the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMOOT. The agreement is with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROOT. If it is worth printing at all it seems to me it is worth printing as it is.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Secretary will object to printing the rate to be paid. It is a new policy that is about to be entered upon between the Secretary of the Interior and users of water for power purposes whose lines run over the public domain, and there are calls for copies of the agreement. I suppose every Senator has noticed that the newspapers of the country are stating that the agreement has already been made. It is for that reason that I desire to have it printed as a public document, so that it may be distributed throughout the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that it all be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withdraw my request at this time and secure the rate and have it included in the agreement. I know that there is no objection on the part of the Secretary of the Interior, and I do not believe there will be any objection on the part of the company.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There certainly should not be objection, because it is a public contract entered into by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHIVELY. Has the Senator the agreement there?

Mr. SMOOT. I have a copy of the agreement.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does that copy contain the rate?

Mr. SMOOT. The place where the rate is mentioned in the original agreement is left blank in the copy. I will state that the Secretary of the Interior called my attention to that fact, and he thought that perhaps it would be just as well, by way of information at least, as applying to the form of the agreement, not to have the rate mentioned in the document.

Mr. SHIVELY. Why can not the Senator have the order made now if he understands that the rate is to be inserted?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator that my objection will be obviated if it is to be printed simply as the form of a contract which the Secretary of the Interior proposes to use.

Mr. SMOOT. I made the request that this form of a contract which has already been used be printed. I do not believe that there will be any objection on the part of the company to inserting the price paid per kilowatt, and I am positive there will be no objection on the part of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, I will withdraw the request now and state that I shall get into communication with the Secretary of the Interior; and if there is no objection on the part of the company, I shall ask that the rate paid per kilowatt per hour be inserted in the agreement to be printed as a public document. I shall ask again some time to-day that it be printed as a document.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator give the Senate the benefit of the information whether or not there is objection?

Mr. SMOOT. If there is objection, I shall not ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator if there is objection to give that information to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does not the Senator think that if there is an objection there should be a resolution introduced by him to secure that information?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any objection. I will say, again, that I know there is no objection on the part of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROOT. If there is objection, we certainly ought to have the information; there is no doubt about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is withdrawn. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask that a copy of the contract issued to the Great Falls Power Co. for its transmission line be printed as a public document. I will state to the Senate that I have included here the price per kilowatt hour as provided in the contract.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask what Great Falls the Senator has reference to?

Mr. SMOOT. Great Falls, Mont.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to inquire whether the document the Senator is asking to have printed relates to the Great Falls Power Co.?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am asking to have it printed as a public document. I will say that it is an agreement between the Great Falls Power Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Montana, party of the first part, and the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railroad Co.

Mr. DIXON. It is an agreement relating to a transmission line for the electrification of the Milwaukee Railroad.

Mr. SMOOT. To a transmission line of about 450 miles to run the cars by electricity.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIVELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES. If I understand correctly, the Senator intends to print the entire contract.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the entire contract.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I also ask that certain clippings from the New York Times, the Washington Evening Star, and the New York Evening Post relative to the same proposition be printed in the RECORD, without being made a part of the public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ELECTRIFYING 450 MILES—PUGET SOUND DIVISION TO BE THE LONGEST ELECTRIC LINE IN THE WORLD.

The Puget Sound division of the St. Paul system will soon let contracts for the electrification of a stretch of 450 miles of its main line in Montana and Idaho, making the longest piece of electric railway in the world. A. J. Earling, president of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, said yesterday that the installation of the electrical equipment would be completed as soon as possible, and that the company expected to be able to dispense with the use of steam locomotives on that section within three years. The mileage to be electrified traverses three principal mountain ranges—the Belt Mountains, the Rockies, and the Bitter Root chain.

The combination of water powers in the section where electrification work is to be done under practically one ownership and management is the one thing in Mr. Earling's opinion, that makes the projected improvement possible. Short stretches of road may be electrified where the power is supplied from one or two developments, but in this contract it is provided that nine separate and distinct water-power systems, to be connected through their transmission lines, will furnish the necessary power. Electrification of steam road on such a scale has never before been attempted.

President Earling gave it as his opinion that the Secretary of the Interior, in confirming the grant mentioned yesterday in Washington dispatches, had taken a greater step forward in the conservation of the country's resources than had been taken by any previous administration. Substitution of electric current for motive power over the mountains would not only conserve a great amount of coal in the ground, he pointed out, but would provide for the utilization of water power which has hitherto gone to waste.

UNITED STATES ISSUES A GRANT—REGARDED AS IMPORTANT STEP IN WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT—GUARDS PUBLIC INTERESTS—MARKS BEGINNING OF ELECTRIFICATION OF TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROADS—RATE REGULATION PROVIDED—UNIFORM ACCOUNTING AND COMPLETE PUBLICITY OF BOOKS AND RECORDS ARE STIPULATED.

The Department of the Interior to-day issued a grant which it regards as the most important step in water-power and electrical development that has been taken for many years. It marks the beginning of the long-predicted electrification of the transcontinental railroads between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific coast, but much more important than this is the fact that this step is to be taken under a grant which embodies the fundamental principles of water-power policy which

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE (S. DOC. NO. 1009).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $20,000 to enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to carry out the provisions of the act approved August 23, 1912, relating to investigations concerning the cost of producing articles dutiable in the United States and leading countries where such articles are produced, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE CHESAPEAKE & POTOMAC TELEPHONE CO. (H. DOC. NO. 1270).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. for the year 1912, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 109) authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. FERRIS, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 20339) for the relief of Joseph W. McCall, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of the congregations of the First Baptist Church of Franklin; the West Congregational Church, of Concord; the First Baptist Church of Cornish; the Baker Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church, of Concord; the Unitarian Church of Charlestown; the Franklin Unitarian Church, of Franklin; the Christian Church of Franklin; the First Baptist Church of Claremont; the Baptist, Congregational, and Methodist Churches of Newport; the Curtis Memorial Free Baptist Church, of Concord; the Advent Christian Church of Dover; the Crown Hill Baptist Church and the Arlington Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of Nashua; and of the First Methodist Church of Concord, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a report of a special committee of the Georgetown Citizens' Association relative to assessment and taxation of property in the District, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRISTOW presented petitions of sundry citizens of Altoona, Langton, and Alden, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURNHAM presented resolutions adopted by the congregations of the Baptist, Congregational, and Methodist churches of Newport, N. H., favoring the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the Commercial Club of Mankato, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation transferring the control of the national forests to the several States, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Local Union No. 412, United Mine Workers of America, of Hymera, Ind., favoring the passage of the so-called Clayton contempt bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES presented resolutions adopted by the Columbia and Snake River Waterways Association, Idaho State League of Commercial Bodies, Idaho-Washington Development League, the Commercial Club of Lewiston, Idaho, and of the Chamber of Commerce of Clarkston, Wash., favoring an appropriation for the completion of the Celilo Canal and the improvement of the Columbia and Snake Rivers, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PERKINS presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., and resolutions adopted by the Southern California Wholesale Grocers' Association, remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHIVELY presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Marion, Elwood, Noblesville, South Bend, and Wolf Lake, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of H. J. Evans, C. V. Mull, J. W. Bucks, E. Shanafelt, D. Glasgow, George Beyler, G. E. Mangun, and 176 other citizens of South Bend, and of the congregation and Sunday School of the First Reformed Church of South Bend, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the repeal of the law providing for the closing of post offices on Sunday, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Orion, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon red-light injunction bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Muskegon, Arbela, and Hillsdale, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND (for Mr. SMITH of Michigan) presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Onaway, Mich., and a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Ann Arbor, Mich., remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PENROSE presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen of the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WATER POWER AND TRANSMISSION LINES (S. DOC. NO. 1008).

Mr. SMOOT. I present the permit to the Great Falls Power Co. for a transmission line and the agreement between that company and the Government of the United States. I ask that the agreement be printed as a public document, and in this connection I have a certain number of newspaper clippings bearing upon the matter that I request be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator kindly restate his proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that the Secretary of the Interior sent me a copy of the permit issued to the Great Falls Power Co. by the Secretary of the Interior for a transmission line over certain public lands. There have been calls for copies of the agreement from all parts of the country, and the Secretary of the Interior desires that it be made a public document. I therefore ask that it be printed as a public document, excluding, however, the price agreed upon between the power company and the railway company.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it is the Great Falls of the Potomac?

Mr. SMOOT. No; of Montana.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator from Utah why not print the whole agreement?

Mr. SMOOT. I have asked that the whole agreement be printed except the rate to be paid per kilowatt per hour.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Why not print the rate?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary thought there may be objections on the part of the companies to having it printed.

Mr. ROOT. I should think there are obvious reasons for having it printed, being an agreement between this company and the Government of the United States, or the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMOOT. The agreement is with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROOT. If it is worth printing at all it seems to me it is worth printing as it is.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Secretary will object to printing the rate to be paid. It is a new policy that is about to be entered upon between the Secretary of the Interior and users of water for power purposes whose lines run over the public domain, and there are calls for copies of the agreement. I suppose every Senator has noticed that the newspapers of the country are stating that the agreement has already been made. It is for that reason that I desire to have it printed as a public document, so that it may be distributed throughout the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that it all be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withdraw my request at this time and secure the rate and have it included in the agreement. I know that there is no objection on the part of the Secretary of the Interior, and I do not believe there will be any objection on the part of the company.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There certainly should not be objection, because it is a public contract entered into by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHIVELY. Has the Senator the agreement there?

Mr. SMOOT. I have a copy of the agreement.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does that copy contain the rate?

Mr. SMOOT. The place where the rate is mentioned in the original agreement is left blank in the copy. I will state that the Secretary of the Interior called my attention to that fact, and he thought that perhaps it would be just as well, by way of information at least, as applying to the form of the agreement, not to have the rate mentioned in the document.

Mr. SHIVELY. Why can not the Senator have the order made now if he understands that the rate is to be inserted?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator that my objection will be obviated if it is to be printed simply as the form of a contract which the Secretary of the Interior proposes to use.

Mr. SMOOT. I made the request that this form of a contract which has already been used be printed. I do not believe that there will be any objection on the part of the company to inserting the price paid per kilowatt, and I am positive there will be no objection on the part of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, I will withdraw the request now and state that I shall get into communication with the Secretary of the Interior; and if there is no objection on the part of the company, I shall ask that the rate paid per kilowatt per hour be inserted in the agreement to be printed as a public document. I shall ask again some time to-day that it be printed as a document.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator give the Senate the benefit of the information whether or not there is objection?

Mr. SMOOT. If there is objection, I shall not ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator if there is objection to give that information to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does not the Senator think that if there is an objection there should be a resolution introduced by him to secure that information?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any objection. I will say, again, that I know there is no objection on the part of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROOT. If there is objection, we certainly ought to have the information; there is no doubt about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is withdrawn. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask that a copy of the contract issued to the Great Falls Power Co. for its transmission line be printed as a public document. I will state to the Senate that I have included here the price per kilowatt hour as provided in the contract.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask what Great Falls the Senator has reference to?

Mr. SMOOT. Great Falls, Mont.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to inquire whether the document the Senator is asking to have printed relates to the Great Falls Power Co.?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am asking to have it printed as a public document. I will say that it is an agreement between the Great Falls Power Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Montana, party of the first part, and the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railroad Co.

Mr. DIXON. It is an agreement relating to a transmission line for the electrification of the Milwaukee Railroad.

Mr. SMOOT. To a transmission line of about 450 miles to run the cars by electricity.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIVELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES. If I understand correctly, the Senator intends to print the entire contract.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the entire contract.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I also ask that certain clippings from the New York Times, the Washington Evening Star, and the New York Evening Post relative to the same proposition be printed in the RECORD, without being made a part of the public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ELECTRIFYING 450 MILES—PUGET SOUND DIVISION TO BE THE LONGEST ELECTRIC LINE IN THE WORLD.

The Puget Sound division of the St. Paul system will soon let contracts for the electrification of a stretch of 450 miles of its main line in Montana and Idaho, making the longest piece of electric railway in the world. A. J. Earling, president of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, said yesterday that the installation of the electrical equipment would be completed as soon as possible, and that the company expected to be able to dispense with the use of steam locomotives on that section within three years. The mileage to be electrified traverses three principal mountain ranges—the Belt Mountains, the Rockies, and the Bitter Root chain.

The combination of water powers in the section where electrification work is to be done under practically one ownership and management is the one thing in Mr. Earling's opinion, that makes the projected improvement possible. Short stretches of road may be electrified where the power is supplied from one or two developments, but in this contract it is provided that nine separate and distinct water-power systems, to be connected through their transmission lines, will furnish the necessary power. UNITED STATES ISSUES A GRANT—REGARDED AS IMPORTANT STEP IN WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT—GUARDS PUBLIC INTERESTS—MARKS BEGINNING OF ELECTRIFICATION OF TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROADS—RATE REGULATION PROVIDED—UNIFORM ACCOUNTING AND COMPLETE PUBLICITY OF BOOKS AND RECORDS ARE STIPULATED.

The Department of the Interior to-day issued a grant which it regards as the most important step in water-power and electrical development that has been taken for many years. It marks the beginning of the long-predicted electrification of the transcontinental railroads between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific coast, but much more important than this is the fact that this step is to be taken under a grant which embodies the fundamental principles of water-power policy which the Department of the Interior has been advocating for the past two years.

It demonstrates not only that the provisions for the protection of the public interests, upon which the department insists, do not prohibit water-power development, as has been claimed by its opponents, but that the greatest development which has yet taken place in the practical application of electricity can be and is being taken under these very provisions.

COMPENSATION TO UNITED STATES PROVIDED.

The grant issued to-day provides for compensation to the Federal Government, very small at first, but subject to periodical readjustment every 10 years.

It provides for regulation of the rates and service, uniform accounting, and complete publicity of books and records; the sale of power to the United States, and to the State within which the transmission lines are located, and to municipal corporations in such State at as low a rate as given to any other purchaser for a like use under similar conditions; protection against fire; and prohibits any transfer or assignment of the permit without the written approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The company is forbidden to claim any earning value for the grant, or any selling value should the public take over the company's works at any time.

The compensation or rentals fixed for each decade must be reasonable, and the company has the right to contest in the courts any rental it believes to be unreasonable; but the burden of proof on this point rests on the company.

The railroad which is taking this epoch-making step is the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railroad, which is electrifying 450 miles of its main tracks between Harlowtown, Mont., and Avery, Idaho; and the company which is furnishing the electricity is the Great Falls Power Co. There is no act of Congress under which the policy which the department has been advocating can be adopted so far as it relates to power sites on the public domain.

PERMIT ESTABLISHES PRECEDENT.

However, under the act passed March 4, 1911, relating exclusively to electrical transmission, telephone, and telegraph lines, it has been found possible to work out a permit which the department regards as a precedent which will have far-reaching effect. The act is not as satisfactory as it should be, but it has been possible under it to demonstrate that private and public interests can be reconciled and coordinated with fairness and justice to both. Indeed, the fact that the power company is willing to accept the fullest provisions for the protection of public interests, even where all it is asking for is a permit for a transmission line, makes the transaction especially significant.

The power company and the Department of the Interior have found that they can cooperate cordially and effectively in working out general rules and regulations under this act and in fixing the terms of a grant so as to recognize effectively both public and private interests and rights. The department wishes to commend particularly the candor and public spirit shown by the representatives of the company in the negotiations which have led up to the issuance of the grant.

(Interview with Mr. John D. Ryan.)

NEW POWER FOR RAILROADS—ST. PAUL LINE OBTAINS GRANT FOR WESTERN WATERS—WILL OPERATE 450 MILES OF TRACK WITH ELECTRICITY GENERATED IN THE MOUNTAIN STREAMS—WILL COST $8,000,000 TO MAKE CHANGE, WHICH WILL PAY FOR ITSELF WITHIN FIVE YEARS.

John D. Ryan believes that the grant just received from the Government by the Great Falls Power Co., of Montana, to transmit over public domain power for the electrification of 450 miles of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul main line between Harlowtown, Mont., and Avery, Idaho, marks the most important step ever taken in the development of northwestern railroads.

In discussing the subject to-day, Ryan, who is president of the Amalgamated Copper Co., as well as the Great Falls Power Co., grew very enthusiastic. The man who succeeded H. H. Rogers as president of the Amalgamated Copper Co. belongs to the younger generation. That means, partly, that he is not afraid to talk for publication, when he has anything to say which concerns the public.

"Until you get into the subject, it is hard to realize what electrification will mean to the western railroad," the president of the Great Falls Power Co. said. "Railroad men themselves are only just beginning to understand. Yesterday one of the best-known operating officials in the Northwest said he was stunned by the announcement that our grant from the Government was based on the understanding that the electrification of 450 miles of St. Paul's track would be completed within three years. He said railroad men knew that the electrification of the northwestern railroads by use of water power was coming, but they all had supposed that it would not come inside of 10 years, and that, therefore, they would have plenty of time to plan."

WATER POWER WASTED.

When Ryan is interested in his subject he talks with almost boyish frankness, and as he picked up one paper after another at his desk on the twentieth floor of No. 42 Broadway, near a large window overlooking the Hudson River, his black eyes danced with excitement.

"Why, the water power that is now being wasted in the Northwest can be transformed into a finished product and delivered to the railroads so it can be turned on and off with a switch like pipe water or an electric light. Last year the St. Paul Railroad, not including its Pacific coast extension, spent $6,202,000 for fuel for locomotives. That was just the bare cost of coal. On a mountain line a railroad uses one-third of its entire equipment for hauling fuel. With electricity that equipment could be earning money and the cost of operating it to haul fuel could be saved.

"As for the economies made possible by electricity, the average cost of steam power in the West is $150 per horsepower. By simply harnessing the water power that is now going to waste electric power can be generated and delivered to the railroads ready for use by turning on a switch for $40 a horsepower.

"After a 150-mile run a steam locomotive has to go to a roundhouse for inspection; to-day the New York Central is using its electric locomotives for 1,200 miles between inspections. For the units of service derived from a ton of coal a steam locomotive is the most wasteful machine ever invented. Every railroad man knows that. An electric locomotive does not stand in a station or sidetrack and 'blow off.' When it is not being used the power is turned off.

"In many places in the Northwest it is physically impossible to build double tracks; the mountain passes will not permit it. Under electricity the capacity of a single-track road can be doubled. The trains move quicker; the equipment and labor now used to haul fuel can be used to handle revenue freight, and operating expenses can be reduced in many other ways. The St. Paul's work will cost $8,000,000, and carefully made estimates show that that amount can be saved in five years by reducing operating expenses."

A 50-YEAR RIGHT.

Ryan added that Secretary Fisher, of the Interior Department, had gone into the question of conservation thoroughly and had given every consideration to the needs of the power company and the railway company, and that the grant confers upon the power company, which has owned its water-power sites for many years, a right of way for 50 years over public lands for reasonable compensation to the Government, under reasonable conditions, which provide for compliance on the part of the power company with State regulations covering business of the kind in which the company is engaged.

He said the power company found no desire on the part of Secretary Fisher to impose any conditions that were not justified by the protection of public interest, and it is believed that general legislation will be enacted along the lines laid down in this grant, which will give a great impetus to water-power development and to railway electrification.

The water powers in the Rocky Mountains and the Cascades in the Northwestern States, he said, would be sufficient to operate every mile of railway west of a line drawn north and south through the center of the State of Montana and north of a line drawn from the southern boundary of Colorado to the Pacific coast.

Ryan said that the necessity for the consolidation of water powers by connecting transmission lines and provision for interchange of power is recognized by all who have given the question any consideration. Railways could not possibly depend for their operation upon power derived from one source or one transmission line.

He believed that not less than 10,000 miles of mountain railway in the Western States will be electrified within the next few years, because of the step taken by the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railway, and that the Government, through Secretary Fisher, has done a great deal to avert the waste which has gone on heretofore, both by the failure to harness water powers and in the consumption of coal which will be needed by future generations. In addition to this, the danger of fires from coal-burning locomotives in the great forests of the West will be avoided. Work on the St. Paul, he concluded, would begin at once.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 7746) to provide for agricultural entry of oil lands, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1108) thereon.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23293) for the protection of the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, Colo., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1109) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BURNHAM:

A bill (S. 8119) granting an increase of pension to Lucinda M. Fuller (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 8120) to tax certain sales, options, and contracts for sale made upon, in, through, in connection with, or under the regulations of certain exchanges and boards of trade; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 8121) to provide an annual vacation for all railway mail clerks; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 8122) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend sections 2291 and 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads"; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 8123) granting an increase of pension to Ellen Maher;

A bill (S. 8124) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Tucker;

A bill (S. 8125) granting an increase of pension to George F. Brechtel; and

A bill (S. 8126) granting a pension to Elizabeth J. Edson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (for Mr. GARDNER):

A bill (S. 8127) granting a pension to John F. Scribner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JACKSON:

A bill (S. 8128) for the relief of Samuel Henson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 8129) granting a pension to Margaret Brennan (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GUGGENHEIM:

A bill (S. 8130) granting to the town of Nevadaville, Colo., the right to purchase certain lands for the protection of water supply (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CLAPP:
A bill (S. 8131) granting an increase of pension to Stanley A. Husted (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.
By Mr. TOWNSEND (for Mr. SMITH of Michigan):
A bill (S. 8132) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Joseph Neveux;
A bill (S. 8133) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Joseph Hadden (with accompanying paper); and
A bill (S. 8134) to correct the military record of Capt. Daniel H. Powers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.
By Mr. DU PONT:
A bill (S. 8135) granting a pension to Mary Helen Harrison;
A bill (S. 8136) granting an increase of pension to John E. Devnish; and
A bill (S. 8137) granting a pension to Susan T. Saunders; to the Committee on Pensions.
By Mr. OWEN:
A bill (S. 8138) to authorize the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to bring suit in the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.
By Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama:
A bill (S. 8139) for the relief of William W. Prude (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.
By Mr. OWEN:
A bill (S. 8140) to authorize the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians to bring suit in the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.
By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:
A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 153) granting to the Fifth Regiment Maryland National Guard the use of the corridors of the courthouse of the District of Columbia upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the marshal of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO THE INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CATRON submitted an amendment providing that no part of the $200,000 appropriated by the act of April 24, 1912, shall be used for the purpose of transporting or making settlement of Apache Indians, prisoners of war at Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., within the State of New Mexico or State of Arizona, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 to investigate the conditions on the Northeast Navajo Indian Reservation, in San Juan County, N. Mex., with respect to the necessity of constructing a bridge across the San Juan River, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MARY CATHCART RANSDELL.

Mr. DILLINGHAM submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 431), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mary Cathcart Ransdell, widow of Daniel M. Ransdell, late Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, a sum equal to 12 months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. REED submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 432), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate pro tempore is hereby authorized to appoint a special committee of five Senators. Said committee shall investigate and at the earliest practicable date report to the Senate whether it is feasible and desirable to improve or remodel the Senate Chamber and the rooms thereunto appertaining.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS (S. DOC. NO. 1007).

Mr. OWEN. I present a paper, being a memorial from the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation of Indians, to accompany the bill (S. 8138) to authorize the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to bring suit in the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, introduced to-day by me. I ask that the memorial be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 27148. An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

OPINIONS OF SENATORS FILED AND PUBLISHED BY ORDER OF THE SENATE SITTING ON THE TRIAL OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD, CIRCUIT JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE THIRD JUDICIAL CIRCUIT, AND DESIGNATED TO SERVE IN THE COMMERCE COURT.

OPINION OF MR. CULLOM.

On articles 1, 2, 3, 5, 9, and 13 I have voted "guilty" because I believe the respondent is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, as charged in these articles.

The testimony clearly shows, in my opinion, that the respondent, by reason of his influence as a judge of the Court of Commerce, secured for himself and others with whom he was associated favors and concessions of value from railroads, which were, or might be, involved in litigation before the Court of Commerce. It is evident that these favors and concessions were granted by the railroads because they believed it would result advantageously to them. To refuse the demands of the respondent would result to their detriment.

I further believe that by his acts the respondent dishonored the high office which he occupied; that he was not honored as one should be occupying so exalted a position, but was regarded as a go-between to further the interests of others.

While I do not believe in the doctrine of recall, yet I do believe that every judge, State or Federal, should have regard for his oath and the law, and if he violates either he should be subjected to impeachment. Judges are placed on the bench to conserve and protect the interests of the people, dealing with one and all alike, and not to connive with others to deprive them of justice and fair treatment.

I voted "not guilty" on articles 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, and 12, believing that they do not constitute the offense of high crimes and misdemeanors, and not because the acts were committed while the respondent was a judge of the district court. In my opinion the Senate would have jurisdiction to try respondent if the articles should warrant such action.

S. M. CULLOM.

OPINION OF MR. CUMMINS.

Statement submitted by ALBERT B. CUMMINS to accompany his votes upon the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

The material facts relating to articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 12 are not in dispute. In my judgment, they are stated in the evidence of Judge Archbald himself as clearly and strongly as in any other part of the testimony. Article 13 does nothing more than to charge a course of conduct which is the legal effect of the facts established and admitted under the seven articles I have first enumerated.

The moral quality of the things done by the respondent was barely mentioned by his counsel, much less defended. This phase of the matter has been substantially ignored by counsel for the respondent and they have seemed to rely upon two propositions, viz: First, that none of the articles accuse the respondent of an offense indictable under the laws of the United States and that therefore there can be no conviction in an impeachment proceeding.

Second, that the respondent being a circuit judge can not be impeached for offenses committed during the time he was a district judge.

I can not accept either of these propositions. While I believe that it is within the power of Congress to provide a distinct procedure for the ascertainment of the behavior of a judge appointed to hold his office during good behavior, yet I have no doubt whatever that there may be misconduct in office which comes within the constitutional phrase "high crimes or misdemeanors." The common law recognized misconduct in office as a crime or misdemeanor; and it can not be fairly questioned that the framers of the Constitution intended to authorize impeachment for such offenses, even though Congress should never pass a criminal statute. It also seems clear to me that a crime or misdemeanor committed by the respondent while district judge which indicates unfitness to hold the office of circuit judge presents an impeachable offense. The identity in the character of the duties to be performed and the continuity of the service emphasize the correctness of this conclusion.

Nothing remains but to say that the conduct and practices admitted by the respondent under articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 12 were so flagrantly wrong and so obviously in violation of the civilized sense of honor and propriety on the part of a person holding the office of judge that they compelled me to vote "guilty" upon each of these articles, and my vote upon article 13 followed as an inevitable consequence. My vote of "not guilty" upon articles 6, 8, and 9 was because, in my opinion, the evidence failed in an essential particular in each instance. A like vote on article 10 was because there was nothing wrong in the thing actually done by the respondent, and a similar vote on article 11 was because the act admitted, though censurable, does not warrant impeachment.

OPINION OF MR. PENROSE.

Mr. PENROSE. I submit a statement of my views on the impeachment of Judge Archbald, which I ask may be filed.

Judge Archbald is 65 years of age, and has been upon the bench 28 years. It is not alleged or proved that he ever violated any law or wronged anyone. It is not alleged or proved that he ever neglected any duty, denied or delayed justice, was partial to any litigant, or even impatient with or discourteous to counsel or clients in any case. On the contrary, it was expressly admitted by the managers who were presenting the case that his integrity, both as a judge and as a man, were incontrovertible; that he was able, industrious, and impartial in the performance of his judicial duties and of good behavior on the bench. His private and public life, so far as has been either charged or proved, is stainless; and it was shown that the people where he lives and has lived for nearly 60 years, the lawyers who practice before him, and his associates on the bench, respect, esteem, and love him. It would be supposed from those admitted facts that there could be no doubt that he was a faithful public official and ought to be retained in his office. Yet he is charged in each of the 13 articles of impeachment with being guilty of a "high crime and misdemeanor," a charge wholly inconsistent with the facts admitted by the managers themselves, as above stated. Under such circumstances but little need be said touching each charge, but they will each be briefly referred to.

The facts touching article 1 show that a gentleman named John M. Robertson owned the Katydid culm dump, and that he was washing the coal from it when his washery burned down. He was required by his lease to pay royalty to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary of the Erie Railroad Co., for all the coal taken from the dump, and that company in turn paid royalty to the Everhart heirs, who owned a half interest in the land from which the coal in the dump had been taken. Judge Archbald and Edward J. Williams obtained an option from Mr. Robertson by which they were to pay him $3,500 for his interest in the dump, and upon application to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. its general manager said he would recommend a sale of its interests for $4,500, thus capitalizing the royalties it would otherwise have received.

The matter never was consummated, because the Everhart heirs disputed the right to dispose of their interest. The Erie Railroad Co. had been a litigant before the Commerce Court, of which Judge Archbald was a member, but the litigation was then pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judge did not take part in the decision of any case in which that road was interested during or after the time of these negotiations. It was alleged in the articles of impeachment that the dump was of greater value than the price being paid for it, but that claim was abandoned at the trial. It may be that it would have been better had the judge not engaged in any other business than in the performance of his judicial duties, but until the doing so is forbidden by law the fact that he or any other judge does so can not make their act a "high crime and misdemeanor." Especially can no inference of improper conduct be drawn as against Judge Archbald, in view of the express admissions above stated.

In article 2 the judge is charged with assisting in the settlement of certain pending litigation between the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and the Marian Coal Co. for a consideration to be paid him in case the settlement was made. At the trial the claim that he was to be paid was abandoned. The facts showed that one C. G. Boland, a neighbor and friend of Judge Archbald for over 30 years, employed one George M. Watson, an attorney in Scranton, to try and settle that litigation. Watson asked Judge Archbald to introduce him (Watson) to the proper official of the railroad. The judge wrote several letters and had several interviews with officials of the railroad to arrange for meetings between them and Watson, but took part in no negotiations touching the matter. Much of that which the judge did was done at the request of his friend Boland, who urged the judge to do what he did because he (Boland) feared that his brother, who was largely interested in the Marian Coal Co., would lose his mind if the case was not settled. It never was settled, and nobody was in any way harmed or wronged. To some it may seem that it would have been better had the judge not tried to help his old friend, but as no law forbade it surely it can not properly be called a "high crime and misdemeanor."

The facts as to article 3 show that the judge and three others tried to lease Packer No. 3 culm dump from the Girard estate with the consent of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which had a lease upon that and much other property of the Girard estate which lease was about expired. The Girard estate did not care to lease the dump, and nothing further was done in the matter. Here also it may be said that it would have been better had the judge not attempted to engage in business, but no law forbade it, and admittedly it did not affect him in any way.

The charge in article 4 is that the judge communicated with counsel on one side of a pending litigation without communicating the facts to counsel on the other side. It appeared that the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission had been argued in the Commerce Court, and in consultation the judges of that court had determined to decide the case against the railroad. Judge Archbald dissented from that conclusion, and in the course of writing his dissenting opinion discovered that there was a mistake in the typewritten testimony. He wrote to the counsel who offered that deposition in evidence to find if he was not correct in that conclusion, and upon receiving a reply that he was he pasted that letter on the margin of the testimony where everybody could see it. Subsequently he wrote to the same counsel in regard to a claim that there appeared in the evidence proof that the commodity rates which had been part of the litigation before the Interstate Commerce Commission showed frequent changes from what was known as the Cooley award, which formed the basis of all rates in the territory where the railroad operated. The answer showed that the case in the Commerce Court had nothing to do with commodity rates, because that matter had not yet been decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission. He did not show either letter to counsel on the other side, nor did either letter have anything to do with the decision of the case, the opinion in which, so far as relates to these two matters being written by another judge and decided upon grounds not referred to in either letter.

Article 5 charged that the judge received $500 for attempting to induce the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. to sell a culm dump to one Frederick Warnke. Six witnesses testified that that charge was untrue and no one testified that it was. The $500 was in fact paid as a commission for effecting the sale of a fill belonging to the Lacoe & Shiffer Coal Co. to the Premier Coal Co. Of that commission the judge received $250, but the matter had no connection whatever with Mr. Warnke and the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co.

The allegation in article 6 that the judge used his influence to induce the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. to purchase from the Everhart heirs their interest in 600 acres of land had no evidence to support it, nor would it have been a high crime and misdemeanor had the fact been so.

Article 7 charged that the judge corruptly agreed to purchase from one W. W. Rissinger an interest in a gold-mining scheme in Honduras; that while that matter was pending he acted as judge at the trial of a case in which Rissinger was largely interested and indorsed a note for $2,500, which was duly discounted and the proceeds of which was to pay for the interest in the gold-mining scheme. The evidence uncontradictedly showed that the note was indorsed five days after the case was ended, that it was not given for stock, but was purely for the accommodation of Rissinger, who had been a scholar in the judge's Bible class, and that the stock was held by the judge as collateral security for the payment of the note.

Articles 8 and 9 charged that the judge indorsed a note for $500, which he caused to be presented to C. G. Boland and W. P. Boland, who were interested in the company which was a party litigant in his court, and when they refused to discount it he caused it to be presented to one C. H. Von Storch, who had been a litigant in his court some time before, and that Von Storch caused his bank to discount it. The facts were shown to be that the judge indorsed the note as an accommodation to a friend, who alone arranged all the matters stated. All agreed that the judge saw no one in relation to the matter and that the only correspondence or conversation he had was with Von Storch, who called him up on the telephone to inquire if the indorsement was genuine. No one pretends that the judge ever did anything further in regard to the matter.

Article 10 charges that in 1910 the judge went to Europe at the expense of and as the guest of Henry W. Cannon, who was a director and officer of several corporations who might become litigants in the judge's court, which then was the middle district of Pennsylvania. The facts were that the corporations were the Great Northern Railroad and certain Pacific coast corporations, who never had and never were likely to have any litigation in that court; that Mrs. Archbald and Mr. Cannon were first cousins; had grown up together and been lifelong friends; that she had been ill; that Mr. Cannon invited her and the judge to visit him at his cottage near Florence; and that the judge, who had not had a vacation for several years, consulted with the other judges in his circuit, and was advised to go with his wife, and did go. Why he should not have gone nobody can see. Certainly no one can understand how it is possible under the admission as to good character—integrity, as hereinbefore stated—it is possible to suppose that his going constituted a "high crime and misdemeanor."

Article 11 charged that when he went on that trip he accepted a gift of over $500 from attorneys practicing in his court. It appeared that a few minutes before the vessel sailed Judge Alonzo T. Searle, of Wayne County, Pa., handed Judge Archbald a sealed envelope, on which was written "Hon. R. W. Archbald. Sailing orders: Not to be opened until 24 hours at sea." When he asked what it meant he was told "A good sailor obeys orders." After the vessel sailed, he opened the envelope and found in it a list of subscribers to the fund who had been personal friends for many years and the sum of money. He was thus placed in a cruel dilemma, for if he returned the money it would appear as if he were accusing them of wrongdoing. For that reason he kept it. Until he opened the envelope he did not know that any attempt had been made or was being made in regard to that matter. That he can be guilty of a "high crime and misdemeanor" because when it was too late to return it to Judge Searle he did not metaphorically slap his friends in the face by returning it is not even conceivable.

Article 12 complains because he appointed a lawyer who was counsel for a railroad company as jury commissioner. The law requires that the jury commissioner shall be a citizen of the district in good standing and of the opposite party from the clerk of the court. The appointee, J. Butler Woodward, was all those things, and we are told, and no one contradicted it, that he comes from an honorable and respected family in Pennsylvania. The managers admitted at the trial that he had done nothing wrong, and it was proved by the records that he did not practice in the court of which he was jury commissioner. If a lawyer ought not to be a jury commissioner, it is easy to say so by act of Congress, but there is as yet no such act. Hence there can be no just ground of complaint against the judge.

Article 13 is a general clause without particulars, intended to embrace in general language the first nine articles, except the fourth, without adding anything new. Judge Archbald was declared not guilty upon the second, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth articles.

OPINION OF MR. PAYNTER.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I have prepared a statement of my reasons for my votes in the Archbald impeachment case. While I do not think it requires an order, I do not like to submit them without announcing that I am ready to file and do file them.

I have reached the conclusion to vote not guilty on each of the articles of impeachment. I do not intend to enter into an extended discussion in giving the reasons which have influenced me in reaching that conclusion. I shall not attempt to cite the precedents which bear upon the question, but I am of the opinion that they do not support the position of the prosecution. My opinion is that the reasoning of the authorities and eminent men who have taken the position that it is essential to maintain an article of impeachment that the accused should be charged with a crime for which an indictment would lie is conclusive.

The penalty in case of conviction is of a very serious character, and for that reason we are strongly admonished to proceed to the consideration of the case as just and impartial judges. If the respondent has committed the acts with which he is charged, then he violated neither statute or common law of the land, nor could such acts be the basis for a prosecution by indictment or information; besides, the alleged acts are not of a character which show turpitude.

After reading the testimony, and especially after hearing the respondent in his own behalf, I am thoroughly convinced that he did not do a single act with any purpose to misuse the official position which he then held. No act, save one, of which complaint is made was an official act. The only one that can be said to be official was the appointment of a jury commissioner, which was his duty under the law to do. The man appointed was not only capable but was a high type of man and worthy to fill the position.

The logic of the prosecution is reduced to this, that though the acts were not official and did not make him guilty of a crime, nor did they involve turpitude, still he should be removed from office and disgraced because he happened at that time to hold the official positions named.

It had been urged by the prosecution that each Senator should erect his own standard, determine the quality of the acts charged, and the respondent's guilt or innocence by that standard. The position of the prosecution is well stated by one of the managers when he said:

> Each Senator must fix his own standard, and the result of this trial depends upon whether or not these offenses we have charged against Judge Archbald come within the law laid down by the conscience of each Senator for himself.

If this be true, then each Senator can enact a statute at the time he votes and impose the penalty which is prescribed by the Constitution for entirely different acts than those for which one is being tried. Those who made the Constitution to protect the lives and the liberties of the people declared that there could be no ex post facto laws enacted, yet each Senator, in the trial of an impeachment proceeding, can then enact an ex post facto law and inflict a punishment for its violation. If this is to be the rule of action by a court, then it no longer can be said to be a government of law; it can no longer be said that the life and liberty of the citizen is safe. While such a rule differs in character from the rule of the mob, yet it is slightly less objectionable.

If such a doctrine is to prevail, then there is too much danger that the consciences of those who try impeachment cases will be affected by a hysterical or debauched public sentiment. Let us hope that this body may never proclaim such a rule, because if it does then is great danger that on some future occasion a sane and safe judicial sentiment may not pervade this Chamber, but, on the contrary, there may be seen the spirit of the mob stalking in its hideous form within these sacred walls.

Should this ever come to pass, the sane and patriotic people of the land will be justified in exclaiming "O judgment! Thou art fled to brutish beasts!" Mr. Story seems to have entertained the views which I have expressed, for he said, in his work on the Constitution, volume 1, page 538:

> The latter is so incompatible with the genius of our institutions that no lawyer or statesman would be inclined to countenance so absolute a despotism of opinion and practice which might make that a crime at one time or in one person which would be deemed innocent at another time or in another person.

At a time when passion was swaying the minds of the people in this country, and when a majority of the leaders of the then dominant political party desired to impeach Andrew Johnson, then President of the United States, the House of Representatives refused to break from its constitutional moorings and adopt a resolution looking to the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, when the articles reported did not charge him with a crime. The minority of the committee of the House of Representatives which passed upon the question presented their views to the House of Representatives, to the effect that as no indictable offense was charged an impeachment proceeding could not be sustained, and the House accepted their view of the law as the correct one.

It discusses with such great clearness the legal question involved in this case I take the liberty of quoting from that report as follows:

> The Constitution of the United States declares that "the House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment." What is the nature and extent of this power? Is it as boundless as it is exclusive? Having the sole power to impeach, may the House of Representatives lawfully exercise it whenever and for whatever a majority of the body may determine? Is it a lawless power, controlled by no rules, guided by no reason, and made active only by the likes or dislikes of those to whom it is intrusted? Have civil officers of the United States nothing to insure them against an exercise of this power except an adjustment of their opinions and official conduct to the standard set up by the dominant party in the House of Representatives? Happily for the Nation this power is not without its constitutional boundaries and is not above the law. When we examine the Constitution to ascertain in what cases the power of impeachment may be exercised—for what acts civil officers may be impeached—we are informed that—
> "The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." (Art. II, sec. 2.)
> In these cases only can the power of impeachment be lawfully used. It would seem to be difficult to mistake the import of this plain provision of the fundamental law of the land; and yet it is not free from conflicting interpretations. This conflict does not arise upon the terms "treason" and "bribery," for they are too well understood and too clearly defined in the Constitution and the laws of the land to admit of any disputation concerning them. They are both crimes of a high grade, and punishable upon indictment in the courts of the United States. They are offenses against the public weal, with just and adequate penalties prescribed for them by the law of the Nation. There is no difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of the Constitution, in so far as it relates to these crimes. Whatever conflict of opinion has arisen respecting the extent of the power of impeachment finds its origin in the terms "other high crimes and misdemeanors." These terms, it has been claimed, give a latitude to the power reaching far beyond the field of indictable offenses. This doctrine is denied. Here arises the only doubt concerning the jurisdiction of the impeaching power of the House of Representatives.
> The fact that the framers of the Constitution selected by name two indictable crimes as causes of impeachment would seem to go far toward establishing as the true construction of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" that all other offenses for which impeachment will lic must also be indictable. Having fettered the House of Representatives by naming two well-defined crimes of the highest grade, it is not to be presumed that the same hands which did it clothed the House with the right to ramble through all grades of crimes and misdemeanors, all instances of improper official conduct and improprieties of official life, grave and unimportant, harmful and harmless, alike. It is unreasonable to say that the men who framed our Constitution, after undertaking to place a limitation on the power of impeachment, ended their effort by throwing away all restraints upon its exercise and placing it entirely within the keeping of those upon whom it was intended to confer only a limited power. There is something more stable than the whims, caprices, and passions of a majority established as a restraint upon this power by the Constitution. The House of Representatives may impeach a civil officer, but it must be done according to law. It must be for some offense known to the law and not created by the fancy of the Member of the House. As was very pertinently remarked by Hopkinson on the trial of Chase, "The power of impeachment is with the House of Representatives, but only for impeachable offenses. They are to proceed against the offense, but not to create the offense and make any act criminal and impeachable at their will and pleasure. What is an offense is a question to be decided by the Constitution and the law, not by the opinion of a single branch of the Legislature; and when the offense thus described by the Constitution or the law has been committed, then, and not till then, has the House of Representatives power to impeach the offender."

A civil officer may be impeached for a high crime. What is a crime? It is such a violation of some known law as will render the offender liable to be prosecuted and punished. "Though all willful violations of rights come under the generic name of wrongs, only certain of those made penal are called crimes." (Encyc. Brit., Vol. XIII, 275.) The offense must be a violation of the law of the sovereignty which seeks to punish the offender; for no act is a crime in any sovereignty except such as is made so by its own law. In England no act is a crime save such as is so declared either by the written or unwritten law of the Kingdom, and therefore only crimes by the law of England are indictable in England. Crimes are defined and punished by law—by the law of the sovereignty against which the crime is committed—and nothing is a crime which is not thus defined and punished. "Municipal law" (which, among its multiplicity of offices, defines and punishes crimes) "is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power in a State, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong." (1 Blackstone, 44.) Nothing is a crime which is not such a breach of this command or prohibition as carries with it a prescribed penalty. Hence Blackstone said: "All laws should be therefore made to commence in futuro." The citizen must be notified of what acts are crimes, and he can not be lawfully punished for any others. The reasonableness of this rule was appreciated and its enforcement provided for by the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States when they placed in that instrument the declaration that "no * * * ex post facto law shall be passed." No act which was not a crime at the time of its commission can be made so by subsequent legislative or judicial action; and this doctrine is as binding on the House of Representatives when exercising its powers of impeachment as when employed in ordinary criminal legislation.

All that has been said herein concerning the term "crimes" may be applied with equal force to the term "misdemeanors," as used in the Constitution. The latter term in nowise extends the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives beyond the range of indictable offenses. Indeed, the terms "crime" and "misdemeanor" are, in their general sense, synonymous, both being such violations of law as expose the persons committing them to some prescribed punishment; and, although it can not be claimed that all crimes are misdemeanors, it may be properly said that all misdemeanors are crimes. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, states it thus: "In common usage, the word crimes is made use of to denote such offenses as are of a more atrocious dye; while smaller faults, and omissions of less consequence, are comprised under the gentle name of misdemeanors only." Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, states the doctrine in this wise: "Temporal crimes, which are offenses against the laws of this realm, whether the common law or acts of Parliament, are divided into two general ranks, or distributions, in respect to the punishments that are by law appointed for them, or in respect of their nature or degree; and thus they may be divided into capital offenses, or offenses only criminal, or rather, and more properly, into felonies and misdemeanors. And the same distribution is to be made touching misdemeanors, namely: They are such as are so by the common law, or such as are specially made punishable as misdemeanors by act of Parliament."

Thus it appears that the terms "crime" and "misdemeanor" merely indicate the different degrees of offenses against law—crime marking the felonious degree, misdemeanor denoting "all offenses inferior to felony." Both indicate indictable offenses. They are terms of well-established legal signification. There is nothing uncertain about them. The framers of the Constitution used these terms as terms of art, and we have no authority for expounding them beyond their true technical limits.

An examination of the several provisions of the Constitution which have any bearing upon this subject will strengthen the position hereinbefore assumed. Section 3, Article I, reads thus: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside, and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present." When the Senate is organized under this section of the Constitution as a high court of impeachment, it is simply a court of special criminal jurisdiction—nothing more, nothing less. It is bound by the rules which bind other courts. It is as much restrained by law as any other criminal court. It is not a tribunal above the law and without rule to guide it; if it were, it might well be addressed in the language of Burke, in one of his speeches in the Hastings case, when he said: "This high court, * * * this highest court of criminal jurisdiction, exercised upon the requisition of the House of Commons, if left without a rule, would be as lawless as the wild savage and as unprincipled as the prisoner that stands at your bar." (Burke's Works, vol. 8, p. 8.) No man would be safe before such a court—a court that could make the crime, determine its mode of proof, pronounce and execute judgment without restraint from the Constitution or laws of the land. No such irresponsible engine of wrong and oppression has been created by the Constitution. The British constitution allows no such unrestricted power to the House of Lords. "An impeachment before the Lords by the Commons in Great Britain, in Parliament, is a prosecution of the already known and established law and has been frequently put in practice, being a presentment to the most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction by the most solemn grand inquest of the whole Kingdom" (4 Blackstone, 259); and when this most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction is assembled for the trial of a person impeached for a violation of the "already known and established law" it must proceed according to the known and established law, for although "the trial must vary in external ceremony, it differs not in essentials from criminal prosecutions before inferior courts. The same rules of evidence, the same legal notions of crimes and punishments prevail." (Woodeson, vol. 2, 611.) A doctrine which would assert for the Senate of the United States greater and more despotic power in cases of impeachment than is possessed by the House of Lords will never be accepted by the American people.

If the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, is not to be bound by the laws which bind other courts, why require the Senators to be put on oath or affirmation? If this court may declare anything a high crime or misdemeanor which may be presented as such by the House of Representatives and pronounce judgment against a civil officer thereon, why swear the members of the court at all? The oath is not a solemn mockery. It is prescribed for some good purpose. What is it? The form of oath adopted by the Senate in Chase's case affords a very satisfactory answer, and it is therefore here quoted, as follows: "You solemnly swear or affirm that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of ————, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws of the United States." (Chase's Trial, vol. 1, p. 12.) This oath is very comprehensive. It covers the charge, the evidence, and all the rules thereof; the decisions upon all questions arising during the progress of the trial; and the final judgment. In all these several respects the members of the court are to be guided by the Constitution and laws of the United States. They can try upon no charges other than treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; and the offense charged must be known to the Constitution or to the laws of the United States. The rules of evidence under and in pursuance of which crimes may be proved upon indictment in the courts of the United States are to be observed. The judgment "shall not extend further than a removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." The office of the oath is to insure a strict observance of these requirements of the Constitution and the laws. This seems clear without further reference to other provisions of the Constitution; but it is proper that we should look at all of its clauses bearing upon the question under discussion.

The Constitution having created a court for the trial of impeachments, prescribed its jurisdiction and placed a limitation on its power to pronounce judgment, then declares that "the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." It would seem difficult, indeed, to misunderstand this language. A civil officer convicted on impeachment is, notwithstanding such conviction, still liable to a prosecution for the same offense in the courts of ordinary criminal jurisdiction. How can this be if his offense be not an indictable crime? The court of impeachment can not apply the usual statutory punishment. It can not go beyond removal from and disqualification to hold office under the United States. The enforcement of other penalties for the same criminal conduct is left to the criminal courts of the country after conviction upon indictment. Is not this substantially a constitutional direction to the court of impeachment not to convict a civil officer of any crime or misdemeanor for which an indictment will not lie? This view of the question was very forcibly stated by Mr. Martin in his argument in Chase's case, in these words: "The very clause in the Constitution of itself shows that it was intended the persons impeached and removed from office might still be indicted and punished for the same offense, else the provision would have been not only nugatory but a reflection on the enlightened body who framed the Constitution, since no person ever could have dreamed that a conviction on impeachment and a removal from office in consequence for one offense could prevent the same person from being indicted and punished for another and different offense." (Chase's Trial, vol. 2, p. 137.) How can the force of this argument be avoided? Wherein does it lack the support of sound reason and good sense? But it does not rest merely upon the clauses of the Constitution above quoted; others, yet to be noticed, give it much additional strength, and these will now be examined.

The section of the Constitution securing the trial by jury reads as follows: "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." (Sec. 2, Art. III.) Can it be successfully claimed that the word "crimes," as here used, is less comprehensive than it is where it occurs in section 4 of Article II? If not, then the crimes for which a civil officer may be impeached are the subjects of indictment or presentment; for such only can be tried by a jury. Any act which is a crime within the meaning of the last-named section is also a crime within the intent of the former, although the converse of this proposition is not true, as it is not every crime which a jury may try that will render a civil officer committing it liable to impeachment. For the latter purpose the crime must "have reference to public character and official duty." (Rawle on the Constitution, 204.) The plain inference to be drawn from the section is, "that cases of impeachment are cases of trials for crimes."

Again, in that part of the Constitution which clothes the President with the power to grant pardons, it is said, "He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." (Art. II, sec. 2.) What is the meaning of the term "offenses"? It can not mean less than such acts as render offenders liable to punishment, else why is a pardon necessary or even desirable? No one needs a pardon who has not committed a crime. A pardon shields from or relieves of punishment. Punishment follows trial and conviction. Trial and conviction for crime can be had only for a violation of an existing law declaring the act done a crime. The term offenses, then, means crimes, in which, of course, is included misdemeanors.

High crimes and misdemeanors are subject to two jurisdictions—first, in the ordinary criminal courts of the country; second, in the high court of impeachment. The same party, for the same acts, may be on trial in both tribunals at the same time. If convicted in both cases, the President may pardon the criminal and relieve him of the consequences resulting from a conviction by the first-named jurisdiction, but the Constitution forbids his interference with the last. The grant of power and the exception are both in the same clause of the same section, and the fact that they are thus intimately associated shows that they relate to the same subjects—indictable offenses.

So intimately are these several sections and clauses of the Constitution connected with each other; so unerringly do they point in the same direction; so irresistibly do they suggest a consecutive train of thought; so perfectly does each part adjust itself to the whole, that it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that nothing less than an indictable crime or misdemeanor will support an impeachment of a civil officer of the United States. A fact recorded in the trial of Chase is very suggestive in this connection. Eight articles were preferred against him by the House of Representatives. It seems to have been admitted that all of the articles except the fifth charged him with criminal conduct. In regard to the fifth, his counsel made the point that it did not "charge in express terms some criminal intent on the respondent." The proof was as clear upon this article as it was upon the remaining seven. Thirty-four Senators voted on the several articles, and while the votes on seven of them ranged from 4 to 19 for conviction, every Senator answered "Not guilty" on the fifth. It is fair to conclude, in view of the proof submitted in support of the several articles, that the members of the court approved the position taken by the counsel of Chase on the trial.

It is claimed by those who oppose the doctrine herein advanced that it is contrary to the current of the English and American authorities. This is an error which a careful examination of the cases will not fail to expose. Comparatively little attention has been devoted to the power of impeachment and to the laws and principles which govern it in this country. Popular opinion is more at fault with respect to this subject than perhaps any other within the entire range of the Constitution. It is generally considered a kind of unlimited, undefined, and undefinable power, whose proper office it is to supply all defects of law and to provide all desired remedies respecting civil officers and their official conduct—a patent medicine for the speedy cure of all cases which baffle the skill of the regular practice. It seems strange that this idea should have become so prevalent, for it has not a fair, impartial, well-considered case in either the United States or Great Britain to support it.

The first case of impeachment by the House of Representatives was that of William Blount, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, in 1797. The articles in this case were five in number. "The first charged the said William Blount with intending to carry into effect a hostile expedition in favor of the English against the Spanish possessions of Louisiana and Florida; the second, with attempts to engage the Creek and Cherokee Indians in the said expedition; the third, with having alienated the affections of the said Indians from Ben. Hawkins, an agent of the United States among the Indians, the better to answer his said purposes; the fourth, with having seduced James Cary, an interpreter of the United States among the Indians, for the purpose of assisting in his criminal intentions; and the fifth, with having attempted to diminish the confidence of the Cherokee Indians in relation to the boundary line, which had been run in consequence of the treaty which had been held between the United States and the said Indians." (Annals of Congress, 5th Cong., vol 1, pp. 499, 919.) These charges were set out with great particularity and were declared to be criminal breaches of Blount's "trust and station as a Senator, in violation of the obligations of neutrality, and against the laws of the United States." They were undoubtedly regarded as indictable offenses. Why they were so regarded will appear hereafter.

Blount appeared by his counsel, Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas, who entered in his behalf a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. The plea set up four reasons why the court should not entertain jurisdiction of the case, though it appears that the matter was disposed of upon a single point. After argument, the following motion was voted on by the court: "That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives; that as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled."

The vote of the Senators upon this motion stood—yeas 11, nays 14; and thereupon the managers of the House of Representatives and the counsel for Blount were informed that—

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed." (Ibid., vol. 2, pp. 2318, 2319.) This is the only point decided in the Blount case.

The next case presented by the House of Representatives was that against John Pickering, judge of the United States District Court of the District of New Hampshire. He was charged with gross misconduct in the trial of a revenue case which grew out of the seizure of a certain vessel for a breach of the revenue laws contrary to his "trust and duty as a judge of the said district court, against the laws of the United States, to the great injury of the public revenue, and in violation of the solemn oath which he had taken to administer equal and impartial justice"; and that he did this "wickedly, intending to injure the revenues of the United States, and thereby to impair their public credit." This was the substance of three of the articles presented in the case. The other one (there being four in all) charged him with "being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits"; and that he appeared on the bench for the purpose of administering justice "in a total state of intoxication," * * * "and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being," etc. (Ibid., 1st sess., 8th Cong., 321.)

Judge Pickering did not appear in the case, but his son sent to the Vice President a petition, which was laid before the court, asking for a postponement of the trial, and that, as his father was incapable of defending himself, he might be defended by his friends. The petition alleged, among other things, that "at the time when the crimes wherewith the said John [Pickering] stands charged are supposed to have been committed the said John was, and for more than two years before and ever since has been, and now is, insane, his mind wholly deranged, and altogether incapable of transacting any kind of business which requires the exercise of judgment or the faculties of reason, and, therefore, that the said John Pickering is incapable of corruption of judgment, no subject of impeachment, or amenable to any tribunal for his actions." (Ibid., 328.)

A discussion arose on this petition, in which the managers of the House of Representatives opposed the reception of the petition and the introduction of evidence in support. But the court decided to "hear evidence and counsel respecting the insanity of John Pickering" by a vote of—yeas 18, nays 12. (Ibid., 332.) A number of depositions were read in support of the petition, and it will be difficult to find any fact in the case better supported or more substantially proved than that of the insanity of the respondent. This issue was a grave and pertinent one, and yet the court, after deciding to entertain it and proceeding to its trial, finally disposed of the case as though no such issue had been raised. This conduct of the court is both remarkable and discreditable; but not more so than its final action on the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused. Pickering was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. If convicted at all, the Constitution required that it should be for high crimes and misdemeanors, as there were no charges of treason or bribery in the case. In order that the guilt or innocence of the respondent should be directly passed upon by the court, without any improper evasion of its real and legal merits, Senator White moved that the "following question be put to each Member upon each article of impeachment, viz, Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors upon the charges contained in the —— article of impeachment, or not guilty?" The mover stated that he had borrowed the form of the question from the one used in the case of Warren Hastings. The question was fair in form, and presented the identical issue which the court was about to decide; but it did not suit the purposes of those who were determined to convict; and it was rejected by a vote of—yeas 10, nays 18. Thereupon Senator Anderson moved the following form, viz, "Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the —— article of the impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?" This form was adopted by—yeas 18, nays 9. (Ibid., 364.) So the court, after entertaining the plea of insanity and neglecting to decide it, on the foregoing evasive and unmeaning question, convicted Pickering on each article, and removed him from office; but this end was reached by a strict party vote. Senator Dayton said of the form of the question and the reason of its adoption: "They were simply to be allowed to vote whether Judge Pickering was guilty as charged—that is, guilty of the facts charged in each article—aye or no. If voted guilty of the facts, the sentence was to follow, without any previous question whether those facts amounted to a high crime or misdemeanor. The latent reason of this course was too obvious.

There were Members who were disposed to give sentence of removal against this unhappy judge, upon the ground of the facts alleged and proved, who could not, however, conscientiously vote that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, especially when committed by a man proved at the very time to be insane, and to have been so ever since, even to the present moment." (Ibid., 365.) If this rule is to be followed, any civil officer may be impeached, convicted, and removed from office, for acts entirely proper and strictly lawful. Who can wonder that members of the court denounced the whole proceeding as "a mere mockery of trial"? Surely, the case reflects no credit on the Senate which tried it, and in one short year the Members of the body seem to have arrived at the same conclusion; for, on the trial of Judge Chase, the form of the question adopted to be propounded to each member of the court was as follows, viz, "Mr. ——, how say you; is the respondent, Samuel Chase, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, as charged in the —— article of impeachment?" (Ibid., 2d sess., 8th Cong., 664.) It is to be hoped that no one will ever quote the Pickering case as an authority to guide the House in presenting, or the Senate in trying, a case of impeachment. It decided nothing except that party prejudice can secure the conviction of an officer impeached in spite of law and evidence.

The next case carried to the Senate by the House of Representatives has gone into history as one "without sufficient foundation in fact or law." (Hildreth's History of the United States, Vol. V, 254.) The case of Samuel Chase, a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, is now referred to. Chase was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in eight articles. It is not necessary to set out the substance of these articles. One of them was founded on his conduct at the trial of John Fries for treason, before the circuit court of the United States at Philadelphia, in April and May, 1800, more than four years before his impeachment. Five of them were based on his conduct at the trial of James Thompson Callender "for printing and publishing against the form of the act of Congress, a false, scandalous, and malicious libel," etc., "against John Adams, then President of the United States," etc. The remaining two rested on his charge to the grand jury in and for the district of Maryland in May, 1803, and his refusal to discharge the grand jury in and for the district of Delaware in June, 1800. The articles portrayed the conduct of Judge Chase in as offensive a manner as the committee could command. The bitterness of Randolph appeared in every article, and the enemies of the accused felt confident of his conviction.

Chase answered minutely and elaborately to the several articles, and filed against each the following plea, viz, "And the said Samuel Chase, for plea to the said article of impeachment, saith that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, as in and by said first article is alleged; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable court in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require." (Ibid., 117.) This was the issue on which the case went to trial. The result was the acquittal of Chase on each article. This result was not owing to a failure of the evidence produced to support the facts alleged; for, so far as at least four of the articles are concerned, the allegations were supported in almost every particular; and had the same form of question been used on the conclusion of the trial as was adopted in the Pickering case, Chase doubtless would have been convicted. The questions propounded in both cases have already been quoted, and a mere glance at them will show how Pickering was convicted and Chase acquitted.

If this case establishes anything, it is that an impeachment can not be supported by any act which falls short of an indictable crime or misdemeanor. This point was urged by the able counsel for Chase with great ability and pertinacity; and the force with which it was presented drove the managers of the House of Representatives to seek shelter under that clause of the Constitution which says: "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior." (Manager Nicholson's speech, ibid., 597.) This provision, respecting the tenure of the judicial office, it was claimed would authorize the impeachment of a judge for misbehavior which would not support an indictment. The court did not approve this position, and very properly; for as the Constitution provides that civil officers may be impeached for high crimes or misdemeanors, and nothing is known to the law as a high crime or misdemeanor which is not indictable, of course an impeachment for anything else would be improper.

If the position assumed by the managers in the Chase case, that a judge may be impeached for mere misbehavior in office, not amounting to an indictable offense, because such conduct is a breach of the tenure by which the judicial office is held, is correct, what would be its effect on the case which this committee now have in hand? If resort must be had to the clause of the Constitution which prescribes the tenure of the judicial office to justify an impeachment of a judge on account of conduct not known to the law as a crime, does it not reach too far to serve the purposes of those who would impeach the President of the United States because of acts for which he may not be indicted? The President holds his office by a different tenure. The Constitution says: "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years." (Art II, sec. 1.) This provision of the Constitution stands firmly in the way of those persons who would tone down the term misdemeanor below the indictable standard by resorting to the clause fixing the judicial tenure. Judges hold their respective offices during good behavior; the President holds for a definite time—four years. If, therefore, the argument proves anything in the former case, it proves too much for the latter. If a judge may be impeached for nonindictable conduct because he holds his office during good behavior, it follows logically that an officer who holds for a term of years can not be so impeached. This exposes the fallacy of the entire argument.

In 1830 the House of Representatives carried another impeachment to the Senate for trial. This was the case against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri. The charge against Judge Peck was of high misdemeanor in office. But one article was presented, which set out with great particularity the facts on which the accusation was based and charged that the "said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, unmindful of the solemn duties of his station, and that he held the same, by the Constitution of the United States, during good behavior only, with intention wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure Judge Edward Lawless, did, thereafter, at a term of the said district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, * * * arbitrarily, oppressively, and unjustly, and under color and pretense that the said Luke Edward Lawless was answerable to said court, * * * as for a contempt thereof," etc.; that he caused Lawless to be unlawfully arrested; that he unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily imprisoned said Lawless in the common prison and suspended him from practicing in said court, "to the great disparagement of public justice, the abuse of judicial authority, and to the subversion of the liberties of the people of the United States." (Trial of Judge Peck, 51.)

Peck filed a lengthy answer, in which he justified his conduct. He alleged that "in all the actions and doings of the respondent in the premises he avers that he was supported and justified by the Constitution and laws of the land." This was the issue tendered by the respondent. He did not rest upon any real or supposed weakness of the case, as presented by the House of Representatives, but boldly declared that his conduct was proper, lawful, and right. He elected to present an affirmative defense and to rely upon the strength of his own cause, and the court sustained him. The vote stood "guilty," 21; "not guilty," 22. (Ibid., 474.)

The next and last case of impeachment by the House of Representatives was that of West H. Humphries, judge of the United States district court for the several districts of the State of Tennessee, in 1862. Seven articles were preferred against Humphries. Each of them charged him in direct and indirect terms with the crime of treason, for they all occurred after the secession of South Carolina and the assembling of armed men to enforce and render successful the treasonable position assumed by that State. The South Carolina convention passed the ordinance of secession on the 17th day of December, 1860. The first criminal act laid to the charge of Humphries was alleged to have transpired on the 29th day of December, 1860, at which time he urged the people of Tennessee to secede, and thus made himself a party to the treason which had already levied war against the United States in South Carolina. The third article charged him with having, in conjunction with others, organized armed rebellion and levied war against the United States; and all of the other articles charged treasonable acts upon him. (Congressional Globe, vol. 48, p. 2277.) Humphries was convicted, as it was right he should be. He was charged with a crime against the known law of the land; he was a traitor against the Government of the United States.

Five cases only of impeachment have been presented to the Senate by the House of Representatives. One of them, as has been shown, was disposed of on a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, two resulted in the acquittal of the accused, and two in conviction.

An examination of the English cases will not, it is believed, lead to a different conclusion. Cases can doubtless be found wherein Parliament has exercised this high power in a most extraordinary manner and convicted persons upon charges not indictable. The power of Parliament over the subject is far greater than that which the two Houses of Congress can exercise over the citizen. The power of Parliament embraces impeachments, bills of attainder, and bills of pains and penalties. In times of high party excitement this power has been in some cases most shamefully and oppressively exercised. Excitement arising from other causes has sometimes put this irresponsible engine of good and evil into motion.

When we take up the reports of the well-considered case of parliamentary impeachments, cases which were controlled by the judgments instead of the passions of men, we find but little difficulty in ascertaining the doctrines on which they rest. No unbiased mind can be misguided by them. They rest upon the known law of England, and were had for its enforcement. They exhibit the House of Lords sitting as a court and bound by the laws and rules which were observed by the other criminal courts of the realm, a court for the trial of offenders against laws which existed when the offenses were committed, and which looked into those laws to see whether or no the persons arraigned at its bar had violated a "rule of conduct prescribed by the supreme power of the State."

In the year 1724 the Commons impeached the Earl of Macclesfield, lord chancellor of England, of high crimes and misdemeanors, in that he had unlawfully sold offices, masterships in chancery, for his own private gain. He had realized large sums of money from this source. This case is given at length in 16 Howell, State Trials, and the conviction hinged exclusively on the fact that he had committed an indictable offense. Of this case Lord Campbell remarks: "There has been a disposition in recent times to consider that Lord Macclesfield was wrongfully condemned. 'The unanimity of his judges,' says Lord Mahon, 'might seem decisive as to his guilt, yet it may perhaps be doubted whether they did not unjustly heap the fault of the system on one man; whether Parker had not rather, in fact, failed to check gradual abuses, than introduced them by his authority or encouraged them by his example.' I must say that although it is impossible not to pity a man of such high qualities when so disgraced, and it must be acknowledged that, with good luck, notwithstanding all that he did, he might have escaped exposure and preserved an untarnished fame; yet, in my opinion, his conviction was lawful, and his punishment was mild. There can be no doubt that the sale of all offices touching the administration of justice (with the strange exception in favor of common law judges) was forbidden by the statute of Edward VI, and every chancellor who afterwards sold a mastership in chancery must have been aware that he was thereby violating that statute." (Lives of the Lord Chancellors, vol. 4, p. 554.)

The report of this case perfectly sustains this position of Lord Campbell. It establishes beyond doubt that had not Macclesfield's conduct been made criminal by the statute of Edward VI, he would not have been convicted. The action of both houses of Parliament outside of the case confirms this understanding of the record. Hatsell (vol. 4, 258), in a note to the case of Macclesfield, furnishes the following facts respecting the action had for the indemnity of the masters who had purchased offices of the lord chancellor. On the charge being sent to the House of Lords, Hatsell says: "The Commons immediately ordered in a bill for indemnifying the masters in chancery from the penalties of the act of fifth and sixth of Edward VI, chapter 16, against buying and selling offices, upon discovering what consideration they paid for their respective offices." The bill was quickly passed by both houses.

But we need not go outside of the very complete report of the case as given in the State trials to sustain the declaration that the proceedings would have resulted in an acquittal of Macclesfield had the charges made against him not involved indictable crimes. Not one of the several able managers for the Commons pretended to claim a conviction in the absence of proof of an indictable crime. The effort of the managers throughout the entire trial was to show that such crimes had been committed by the accused earl. They claimed that the acts with which he stood charged were crimes at common law, by the statute of 12 Richard II, and of Edward VI; in the language of one of the managers, "criminal by the common law and criminal by act of Parliament."

No unbiased mind can examine this case and arrive at a conclusion respecting it different from that which has been stated above. The doctrine of the case is, beyond all question, that an act, to be impeachable, must also be indictable.

The case was free from all passion, resentment, revenge, or partisan bias. It was well considered, and the vote in favor of conviction was unanimous. The case reflects the law of England respecting impeachments as well as any one that was ever tried by the House of Lords. The rules of law concerning crimes and their proof were observed and adhered to throughout, and Macclesfield was convicted because he was proved guilty of crimes declared by the law, and indictable in the courts of England.

The case of Warren Hastings is another full of instruction. No one can read the 22 articles preferred against Hastings and fail to discover a multitude of crimes prescribed by the law of England. Bribery, peculation, usurpation of powers, official corruption, official oppression, and extortion all appear in the long array of crimes laid to the charge of Hastings, and each of them was indictable in the criminal courts of the realm.

Of these crimes Burke, in his speech on the third day, said:

"As to the crime which we charge, we first considered well what it was in its nature and under all the circumstances which attended it. We weighed it with all its extenuations and with all its aggravations. On that review we are warranted to assert that the crimes with which we charge the prisoner at the bar are substantial crimes; that they are not errors or mistakes, such as wise and good men might possibly fall into; which may even produce very pernicious effects without being, in fact, great offenses. The Commons are too liberal not to allow for the difficulties of a great and arduous public situation. They know, too well, the domineering necessities which frequently occur in all great affairs. They know the exigency of a pressing occasion which in its precipitate career bears everything down before it, which does not give time to the mind to recollect its faculties, to reenforce its reason, and to have recourse to fixed principles, but, by compelling an instant and tumultuous decision, too often obliges men to decide in a manner that calm judgment would certainly have rejected. We know, as we are to be served by men, that the persons who serve us must be tried as men, and with a very large allowance indeed to human infirmity and human error. This, my Lords, we know, and we weighed before we came before you. But the crimes which we charge in these articles are not lapses, defects, errors of common human frailty, which as we know and feel we can allow for. We charge this offender with no crimes that have not arisen from passions which it is criminal to harbor; with no offenses that have not their root in avarice, rapacity, pride, insolence, ferocity, treachery, cruelty, malignity of temper; in short, in nothing that does not argue a total extinction of all moral principle, that does not manifest an inveterate blackness, dyed ingrain with malice, vitiated, corrupted, gangrened to the very core. If we do not plant his crimes in those vices which the heart of man is made to abhor, and the spirit of all laws human and divine to interdict, we desire no longer to be heard on this occasion. Let everything that can be pleaded on the ground of surprise or error upon those grounds be pleaded with success; we give up the whole of those predicaments. We urge no crimes that are not crimes of forethought. We charge him with nothing that he did not commit upon deliberation; that he did not commit against advice, supplication, and remonstrance; that he did not commit against the direct command of lawful authority; that he did not commit after reproof and reprimand, the reproof and reprimand of those who are authorized by the laws to reprove and reprimand him. The crimes of Mr. Hastings are crimes not only in themselves, but aggravated by being crimes of contumacy. They were crimes not against forms, but against those eternal laws of justice which are our rule and our birthright. His offenses are, not in formal, technical language, but in reality, in substance and effect, high crimes and high misdemeanors." (Burke's Works, vol. 7, pp. 13, 14.)

This is Mr. Burke's own interpretation of his articles against Warren Hastings. Apply to this the doctrine that acts which are malum in se are crimes at common law, and what must become of every attempt to torture this case into a prop to uphold the dangerous doctrine that public officers may be impeached for acts not known to the law as crimes or misdemeanors? It is believed safe to aver that every offense for which a conviction was really claimed by the managers on behalf of the Commons was known to the law of England as an indictable crime.

For some seven years the trial of this ponderous case "dragged its slow length along" before a conclusion was reached. During the whole trial the rules of the criminal law of England were applied to the case. Questions relative to which the Lords had doubts were submitted to the judges. The managers complained of some of the opinions of the judges, but the Lords followed the judges. The end of the case was an acquittal of Hastings. But it would be difficult to understand how this result could have been arrived at if the doctrine that an impeachment may be had for acts not indictable had been countenanced by the Lords, for no one can doubt that the evidence disclosed sufficient in the way of mistakes, errors, and misbehavior to justify a conviction under that doctrine.

The last English impeachment case was that of Viscount Melville in 1806. A very complete report of this case may be found in 29 How. S. T., 550 to 1482, inclusive, and it will well repay a careful perusal, as it was a thoroughly and calmly considered case, and undoubtedly presents the settled doctrine of the English law of impeachment.

Melville was treasurer of the navy, and the Commons charged him in 10 articles with having "fraudulently, corruptly, and illegally" used, and permitted others to use, the public money intrusted to him for private gain. Sir Samuel Romilly, solicitor general, who was one of the managers for the Commons, in his argument stated the case thus: "My Lords, the crimes imputed to the noble lord are of two kinds; they are offenses against the common law, and a direct breach of a positive act of Parliament. The first and the tenth articles of impeachment relate only to offenses at the common law, and the other articles comprise in them offenses at the common law and likewise violations of the act of Parliament" (p. 1151). He insisted that Melville's acts were indictable crimes, and in no part of his argument did he claim, nor did any other manager for the Commons claim, that a conviction could be justified on any other ground than that the evidence disclosed an indictable offense. No one during the entire course of the proceeding and trial questioned that such was the law of England.

At the close of the case the Lords sent three questions to the judges, substantially directing them to inform the House whether the facts recited constituted such unlawful proceedings on the part of Melville as "would have been a misdemeanor or punishable by information or indictment." The judges answered that they were not such unlawful acts as could be thus punished (pp. 1469–1471). Melville was thereupon acquitted upon each of the 10 articles preferred against him. And this closes the list of parliamentary impeachments in England.

Cases can be found in parliamentary history in conflict with the doctrine stated. But that it would be wise, safe, or lawful for the House of Representatives to follow such cases is utterly denied. If we are to be guided at all by English cases, let us resort to those which were the best considered, the latest, the most calmly tried, the most enlightened to be found on the records of Parliament, and not those that were molded in the midst of revolution, directed by passion, and decided by unreasoning prejudice.

No precedent should be followed which is not founded in reason. The enlightenment of the present day should not be obscured, nor its progress obstructed, by the follies, mistakes, or passions of men who passed away centuries ago. Who would think of respecting the infamous ruling of Jeffreys in Sidney's case because it was the act of a judge upon the bench? And yet who does not know that many of the parliamentary impeachments were as full of passion and as void of law as the court in which Sidney, and Russell, and Armstrong, and Baxter were tried?

The idea that the House of Representatives may impeach a civil officer of the United States for any and every act for which a parliamentary precedent can be found is too preposterous to be seriously considered. However well such precedents may answer present purposes, they may return to plague those who give them countenance. Those who hold to the doctrine that the "Senate is the sole judge" of what are high crimes and misdemeanors, and that "there is no revising court" (Am. Law Reg., Sept., 1867, p. 660), forget how often appeals in this country are carried from Senates, Congresses, Presidents, and courts to the high tribunal of the people at the ballot box, and how inexorable are the mandates of reversal which proceed therefrom. The history of this country is crowded full of such appeals and of their results.

The Constitution provides that the judges, both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior. In the discussion of the case much importance has been attached to this clause. It seems to be the opinion of some that because the Constitution provides that a judge shall hold his office during good behavior the Senate can remove him for any act, regardless of its character or quality, if in its judgment it regards such an act misbehavior. The Senate is absolutely without jurisdiction to determine when a judge has been guilty of misbehavior which deprives him of the right to hold office except on the trial of impeachment proceedings. The only acts for which the Senate can remove a judge is when he is found guilty of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The clause of the Constitution relating to the holding of office during good behavior has nothing whatever to do with the jurisdiction of the Senate of the question of removal. If the clause was entirely eliminated from the Constitution, still if the Senate should find that the accused had been guilty of treason, bribery, or high crimes or misdemeanors its power to adjudge a removal would be complete.

In conclusion, I desire to say that I do not believe Judge Archbald used his official position to aid him in the prosecution of business transactions. If I had any doubt about it, his 28 years' service as an impartial and upright judge would remove it.

T. H. PAYNTER.

OPINION OF MR. SIMMONS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in explanation of my votes, pursuant to consent given by the Senate, on the articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, charging misbehavior in office while he held the office of district judge—an office which he did not hold at the time the Senate voted upon his impeachment—I wish to state I voted "not guilty" on these articles for the reason that I was in doubt as to whether we had the right to impeach the respondent for acts committed in an office which he no longer held, and I felt it my duty to give the respondent the benefit of this doubt.

The thirteenth article of impeachment charged the said Archbald with sundry acts of misconduct while he was district judge, and with sundry acts of misconduct while he was circuit judge, the latter being the office held by him at the time the Senate voted upon the articles of impeachment. I voted "guilty" upon this article because, in my opinion, the charge contained therein was sustained if he was guilty of some of the material acts of misconduct therein charged while he was holding the office of circuit judge.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. Agreeably with the notice given by me, I now ask to take up Senate bill 26680, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming ask that the Senate take up for consideration House bill 26680. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator yield while I put a request to pass a bill on the calendar? It should not take three minutes to pass it.

Mr. WARREN. I do not like to deny the Senator. If it leads to no debate and if I am at liberty to yield, I shall be glad to do so, but I hope there will be no other request of that kind made.

Mr. SHIVELY. I conceive that it will not lead to debate. It is House bill 18787.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks for the present consideration of House bill 18787. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to inquire what change is made in the existing law by this proposed act?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, only this change is proposed to be made in the existing law: The courts have decided that workers on dredges engaged in the Government service fall in the category of sailors, and have therefore held them to be subject to maritime jurisdiction. This bill simply proposes to extend the eight-hour principle to the workers on dredges just as it is extended to workers on other public works.

Mr. BURTON. That is, it proposes to extend it to those engaged on dredges employed by contractors who are doing river and harbor work for the Government?

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. From what committee does this bill come?

Mr. SHIVELY. From the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the answer of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] to the question propounded by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] makes it necessary for me to ask another question. In the general eight-hour law an exception was made in favor of such work as was done upon the levees and upon the beds of streams in connection with bank protection and other safeguards against overflows. Dredging is a feature of that work at times. I should like to have an opportunity to see to what extent this proposed law would modify that. It is very undesirable to modify it at all, because that work is, in its nature, emergency work. If it would suit the Senator from Indiana to permit this matter to go over for a little while, I should be glad. That would afford me an opportunity to make the comparison between the two, with a view to determining whether this proposed law interferes with the recent action of Congress.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, when I called up this bill I engaged with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that there would not be much time consumed in debate on it. Under the circumstances, I feel bound to let the bill go over.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very well. I will promise the Senator that I will not unduly delay the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of the bill and that it be read first for committee amendments, other amendments to follow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be now read for the consideration of committee amendments.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it seems to me that the policy we pursued at the last session with reference to offering amendments was a good one, and that the bill should be read, not only for committee amendments, but for all other amendments.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my request, but, as the Senator understands, unless we pursue this course, the bill will be formally read; the amendments will not be considered on that reading; and, then, there will have to be a second reading for amendments. I think Senators will understand the bill better if we proceed as I have indicated, by dispensing with the formal reading of the bill and considering the committee amendments as we go along.

Mr. JONES. I do not want to object to that part of the request, but the idea I had was that, if the bill is read for amendment, all amendments, whether committee amendments or amendments offered by Senators, might be considered as the reading proceeds; otherwise we will be compelled to wait here until the bill is read clear through and all the committee amendments have been disposed of before any individual amendments can be offered from the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in reply to that statement I have this to say: Oftentimes a Senator—and I think all should be here when the bill is being considered—will find what he seeks in some other part of the bill and he is better equipped to offer his amendment after the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I know what amendments I intend to offer, and they are not in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make any motion in regard to it? The question before the Senate is the request of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

Mr. JONES. I do not object at all to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill. I agree that that shall be done; and then I ask that the bill be read for amendment, so that all amendments may be considered.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming withdraws his request. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is no objection, certainly, to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The Senator from Wyoming withdrew his request to that effect.

Mr. LODGE. Then, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I am willing that any other Senator shall take charge of the bill if he thinks he is more competent.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a question of competency. I was simply seeking to save the time of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. The question about the formal reading has come up here several times in the past, and sometimes there seems an insinuation that somebody wants to prevent enough reading of bills, so that I think that we ought to proceed under the rule.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington, as I understood, simply asked for a modification of the usual request in regard to amendments. Because he has made that request, it seems rather hard that the formal reading of this long bill shall therefore be inflicted upon the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will have to be read at some time.

Mr. LODGE. Of course the bill is read when it is read for amendment. The Chair, of course, is aware, as I am, that there is no provision in the rules for the formal reading. A bill has to be read; and if it is read for amendment it entirely covers the requirement of the rule. The formal reading is a mere habit. After the bill is read formally, then you simply offer the amendments. If you read it for amendment, the same result is obtained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. WARREN. On page 2, lines 24 and 25, is the first amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). It will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Legislative," subhead "Senate," in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the Secretary, on page 2, line 24, after the words "harbor bill," to insert the name "Woodbury Pulsifer," so as to read:

Compiler of Navy Yearbook and Senate report on river and harbor bill, Woodbury Pulsifer, $2,220.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I suppose that amendments which Senators may desire to offer will be considered after the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. WARREN. There is no such inhibition. The bill is open for amendments to be offered as we go along. The privilege of considering committee amendments first was denied, so that the bill is open to amendment now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer an amendment on page 2, and that was the reason of my inquiry.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It can be offered at any time.

Mr. WARREN. The next amendment of the committee is on page 7, unless the Senator from Oregon wants to put in an amendment now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer an amendment on the second page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 15, after the amount "$3,250," and before the semicolon, insert "and $1,250 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent," so as to read:

Chief clerk, $3,250, and $1,250 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have only this to say: The committee, in considering salary advancements of that kind, have felt indisposed to enter into the field at this time, believing that such advancements should pass over to the next Congress, which will take charge of the appropriations under a different régime.

This increase was not estimated for, but I shall make no point of order on that account. It is for the Senate to decide. But on this and other questions of a similar character I want to have it understood where the committee stands.

The committee has no desire to control arbitrarily these salaries, but it would submit the committee and the Senate itself to criticism to raise a line of salaries at this time, just as the administration and control of one side of the Chamber is about to change to the other.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to say, in reply to the Senator from Wyoming, that this is not an innovation on the practice that the Senate has followed heretofore in recognizing efficient service performed by men who have been in the employ of the Senate for a great many years. This amendment proposes to increase the salary of the Chief Clerk, who has been in the service of the Senate for more than 30 years, and he not only acts as Chief Clerk but he acts as parliamentarian of the Senate as well. It is unnecessary for me to call the attention of the Senate to the efficient service that he has rendered at all times to the Vice President of the United States in matters that come before him. For the same service that he is rendering here, in the House of Representatives, I think, $4,250 or $4,500 is paid. The provision which I suggest ends with the term of the present incumbent, and the salary would then go back to the original amount. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the item of appropriation for clerks and messengers to committees of the Senate, on page 7, line 3, before the word "messenger," to strike out "assistant clerk, $1,440," and, in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$370,940" and insert "$369,940," so as to read:

Assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Railroads—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Revolutionary Claims—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Rules—clerk $2,220, assitant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Standards, Weights, and Measures—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Territories—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Transportation and Sale of Meat Products—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Transportation Routes to the Seaboard—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; University of the United States—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Woman Suffrage—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; in all, $369,940.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Chair to instruct the Secretary to check up all totals, because the amendments that come in from time to time will change the totals. It is better to do that way than to undertake to change them as we go along.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made, and the Secretary will correct the totals as requested.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 7, after line 14, to insert:

For additional amount for the clerk to the Committee on Rules for revising and preparing for publication biennially, under the direction of the committee, the Senate Manual, to be immediately available, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, in lines 22 and 23, it is proposed to strike out the words "two thousand five hundred and ninety-two dollars" where they occur and to insert in lieu thereof "three thousand dollars," so as to read:

Assistant Doorkeeper, $3,000; Acting Assistant Doorkeeper, $3,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that my remarks just now made as to another amendment are applicable here. I think I ought to say, however, that during the period in which I have had charge of this bill all, or nearly all, of these Senate employees' salaries have been raised, and it has been my pleasure to be one of the most liberal of all Senators. I do not object to the amendment, but I leave it in the same manner that I did the other—for the Senate to vote upon. I suggest, however, to the Senator that it ought to apply to these particular officials on both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand the amendment, it is applied to both sides.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. PENROSE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What is the effect of that amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. The effect of it is to raise the salaries of the Assistant Doorkeeper and the Acting Assistant Doorkeeper, covering the Democratic and Republican officials in this Chamber holding those places. Their salaries, I understand, have not been changed for 40 years. This is putting them back to the condition which existed when Mr. Bassett held the position of Assistant Doorkeeper of the Senate. I think it is a very fair, meritorious, and well-earned increase.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What particular circumstance directs attention to these particular positions at this particular time, just at the end not only of a Congress but at the end of an administration?

Mr. PENROSE. The end of the administration has nothing to do with this Congress. When the Senate is organized by our friends on the other side of the Chamber the caucus nominee, who will then be the Assistant Doorkeeper, will be the beneficiary of this salary.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Nobody ought to be the beneficiary of it unless it is right. What are the grounds for insisting upon this increase at this time—the high cost of living?

Mr. PENROSE. The ground, Mr. President, is that these salaries have not been raised for 40 years.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Is there any rule which requires salaries to be raised every 40 years?

Mr. PENROSE. No; but a large number of other salaries in connection with positions in and about this Chamber have been raised. As I understand, when Mr. Bassett was here he had an appropriation which made the salary the equivalent of the one which this amendment will make it, and I sincerely hope that the Senator from Arkansas will not make any opposition, or, at least, that he will let the amendment go to conference.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, on page 8, line 14, after the word "session," to strike out "$8,440" and to insert "$8,480," so as to read:

Sixteen pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, $8,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the amendment just adopted, on page 8, line 15, to insert:

And the accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby directed to credit the Secretary of the Senate in the sum of $200 under the appropriation entitled "Salaries, officers, and employees, Senate, 1913," being the amount paid 16 pages of the Senate at the rate of $2.50 per diem for the five days remaining of the month of August, 1912, after the day of adjournment, and for said purpose the sum of $200 is hereby appropriated, said sum to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether there is not an omission of a word in lines 20 and 21, on page 6, "clerk of printing records." Does not that refer to the clerk of a committee?

Mr. WARREN. As to what amendment?

Mr. BRISTOW. The provision on page 6, line 21. Is not the name of a committee omitted at that point?

Mr. WARREN. No; I think not.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just after the provision in reference to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WARREN. "The clerk of printing records." That is not a committee at all, but it is authorized under the law, and a Senate clerk looks after that printing; but it does not really belong to any committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. I refer to the point where it reads:

Assistant clerk, $1,800; messenger, $1,440.

Mr. WARREN. They are the assistants of this man.

Mr. BRISTOW. Where are they employed?

Mr. WARREN. They are employed between the Printing Office and the Capitol, back and forth.

Mr. BRISTOW. They are put in here as though they were committee clerks. That is the reason I made the inquiry.

Mr. WARREN. That may be true; but the item is in the same position where it was originally put, and we saw no reason to change it. It is the existing law.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 29, line 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated. The Chair, however, will state to the Senator from Virginia that that point in the bill has not yet been reached. Of course the Senator has a right to offer the amendment to any part of the bill if he so desires.

Mr. WARREN. We shall get to that in a few moments.

Mr. SWANSON. I have a very urgent engagement, and I should like to offer the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 17, after the word "watchmen," it is proposed to strike out "$720" and to insert in lieu thereof "$900."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to say in this connection that this amendment is to increase the salaries of the 17 men who are designated as watchmen, but who are really policemen for the Library. The policemen of the Capitol get $1,050, and $720 is all that these men have been getting since the completion of the Library, though the cost of living has greatly increased. This increase of salary has been recommended by Maj. Green, who was Superintendent of the Library for a great many years; but, through some oversight, there has been no increase. The men who are watchmen or policemen for the Library are a very fine class of men; it requires men of a high class of efficiency. They work eight hours a day and alternate day and night. It seems to me a salary of $900 is not excessive for these men.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, it seems that we have set out here upon a systematic increase of salaries, without any definite basis upon which to fix them. This just seems to be an opportunity when things are going along easily that anybody who wants anything has only to butt in and get it. The services of the gentlemen who are to be the beneficiaries of this increase, as they are described by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], are not very onerous. The Library is not a place where criminals assemble, these men have no police duties to perform, and they are there but for the very extensive term of eight hours a day.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. They are not policemen; they are watchmen.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I was getting to that. I understood what the Senator from Virginia had said. He said that they were virtually policemen at that place. No policemen are required there; it is not a place where the services of an ordinary policeman are needed. They are simply to direct persons where to go. The service is a very light one, and the compensation provided by law is a very ample one. If it is intended to set out upon a readjustment of salaries, then we ought to do it in a systematic way, so that we may know who is being underpaid and who is being overpaid, and may cut down the salaries of those who are receiving more pay than they ought to have. It is quite the fashion here to take some extremely meritorious case as it is detailed by some particular Senator and make an allowance in one man's favor that when applied and confined to that particular person would not seem excessive on that occasion. Frequently his disabilities are taken advantage of as the foundation of the demand. Then the very next thing you know that circumstance is advanced as a reason why the salary of everybody else should be increased and a comparison is instituted between that particular person and others who render service of equal importance.

I am opposed to these increases without a systematic investigation by some responsible committee of the Senate. I think the amendment is subject to a point of order. It has not been reported from a committee and it is not estimated for. So I make the point of order against its further consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to occupy simply a few moments. These men receive $60 per month. They have to support their families and they work eight hours a day and alternate in the night work. As I have said, it takes a very fine class of men to fill these positions. More people visit the Library than visit the Capitol. Nearly everybody who comes to Washington as a visitor goes to the Library; it is crowded. The work of these men is heavy all the time, and, upon investigation, I am satisfied they are the poorest paid employees of the Government.

The Senator has well said that it is very easy to get increases in many cases, but I have noticed the increases are generally for the higher officials, and that the men who work and toil have much difficulty in securing proper increases. I do not know whether or not this bill carries an increase for the high officials of the Library, but I have noticed the antagonism to increases is generally directed to the employees who are paid the lower salaries. It takes more than an ordinary man to do this work in the Library.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator will permit the Chair to rule upon the point of order, it may not be necessary for me to reply.

Mr. SWANSON. I know the point of order has been interposed. I simply wish to put in the RECORD the reasons why these men should have their salaries increased, as I would not like to let pass unchallenged the statement of the Senator from Arkansas that they are amply compensated. There has been no increase in the salary of these employees, and anybody who visits the Library must know that it is crowded all the time. These men work excessively, and I know of no class of employees of this Government who receive so small a compensation for the class of work they perform as the watchmen at the Library. I hope the Senator will not make any point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will have to disappoint the Senator; I insist upon the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is clearly obnoxious to the rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 9, to insert:

For the following for service of the Senate Chamber (heretofore paid from appropriation "Miscellaneous items on account of the Maltby Building"), namely: Messengers—4 at $1,440 each, 1 at $1,000; laborers—3 at $800, 5 at $720 each; in all, $12,760.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was being considered at the last session, objection was made to the Maltby Building pay roll, and I wish to renew the objection. Nothing is going on there that requires any such force, and this is simply a way, it seems to me, of using the employees somewhere else.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. These men are now and have been for a long time employed here at the Senate doors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. We have closed the Maltby Building, so far as any employees of the Senate are concerned. This amendment only refers to those who are daily employed here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that, Mr. President, and that is just what I am objecting to. I object to carrying on the pay roll as for the Maltby Building men who are not for the Maltby Building. If they are needed here, I do not object to them here, but I object to the system of appropriating for men for one place when in reality we are going to use them somewhere else. I think the bill should show where these employees are to be used, if they are to be used.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that his wish is exactly mine and that of the committee, but the bill came over from the House with an entire cutting out of any reference to the Maltby Building. They did not understand the matter. I have here the list of these employees, and if the Senator wishes it to go into the RECORD, it can go in. The intention, of course, is when the next appropriation bill is taken up to have them estimated for among the employees in the regular way, but the committee had no authority to estimate for them, and the House, not understanding the situation, said that they would no longer make provision for the support of the Maltby Building as a Senate proposition, although they intended to use it, perhaps, for the overflow of their Members, and left it out. So the only way we can reach the matter is that provided in the bill. The employees covered by the amendment are not for the Maltby Building. As the Senator will notice, the amendment reads:

For the following for service of the Senate Chamber (heretofore paid from appropriation "Miscellaneous items on account of the Maltby Building"), etc.

I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator's idea about it. If the Senator wishes the list of the employees, I have it here and it can be put in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have said all I care to say about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 9, line 9, before the word "attendant," to strike out "two messengers, at $1,440 each," and in line 14, after the words "in all," to strike out "$13,500" and to insert "$10,620," so as to make the clause read:

For the following for Senate Office Building under the Sergeant at Arms, namely: Stenographer in charge of furniture accounts and keeper of furniture records, $1,200; attendant in charge of bathing rooms, $1,800; 2 attendants in bathing rooms, at $720 each; 3 attendants to women's toilet rooms, at $720 each; janitor for bathing rooms, $720; 2 messengers, acting as mail carriers, at $1,200 each; messenger for service to the press correspondents, $900; in all, $10,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 11, before the word "annual," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "thirty," and, in line 13, after the word "each," to strike out "$70,000" and insert "$60,000," so as to make the clause read:

Clerks to Senators: For 30 annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $2,000 each, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 15, before the word "stenographers," to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "twenty-three"; in line 17, before the word "minority," to strike out "the three junior" and insert "three"; and in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$31,200," so as to make the clause read:

Stenographers to Senators: For 23 stenographers to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, and 3 stenographers to the chairman of three minority committees, at $1,200 each, $31,200.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, there is one amendment which the Secretary seems to have omitted. Is it proposed that the amendments shall be jumped just as is done when the bill is being read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it was agreed that the Secretary should correct all totals throughout the bill, so that the amendments correcting totals are omitted from the reading.

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well; I was absent at the time that was done.

Mr. WARREN. It is a safer way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment stated by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 11, after line 15, to insert:

For removal and expenses incident thereto of the documents now in a rented warehouse to a building or buildings owned by the Government, including the Maltby Building, and building or buildings on squares 634 and 685, to be under the supervision of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, to whom authority is hereby given, to be immediately available, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 23, to insert:

For shoring building or buildings made necessary on account of removal of documents, including material, under the direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, to be immediately available, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 7, after the word "page," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Capitol Police," on page 12, line 11, before the word "lieutenants," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 13, before the word "privates," to strike out "thirty-three" and insert "sixty-seven"; and in line 16, after the words "in all," to strike out "$41,250" and insert "$78,150," so as to make the clause read:

For captain, $1,800; 3 lieutenants, at $1,200 each; 2 special officers, at $1,200 each; 67 privates, at $1,050 each; one-half of said privates to be selected by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives; in all, $78,150, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 19, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$200" and insert "$300," so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses, $300, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Joint Committee on Printing," on page 12, line 23, after the word "Printing," to insert the name "George H. Carter," so as to make the clause read:

For clerk to the Joint Committee on Printing, George H. Carter, $3,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I object to that. It does not seem to me that the name of that clerk ought to be inserted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment. I simply desire to say that this has been done heretofore in both the House and the Senate, where the man employed is one who is so peculiarly fitted and is so valuable that it is thought best to give him a permanent place. In this case there seemed to be assent on the part of all parties interested on both sides, and that is the reason for the committee inserting the name in this case as they have done in some other cases.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it ought to be done, and I object to the insertion of names in an appropriation that attaches the permanent office by legislative enactment.

Mr. WARREN. It is only for one year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the matter ought to be left open for the action of those in authority.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it would have that effect for only one year. I will say to the Senator there is not a member of the committee of whom I know who is not in favor of putting the name of George H. Carter in the bill. One who has not been on the committee can hardly realize the amount of detail work that has to be taken care of by this committee, and Mr. Carter is eminently fitted and qualified for the place as is no other man in the United States. I understand that Senators on the other side of the Chamber have made the request that his name go in, and I certainly hope the Senator will not object to it. I am positive that if the Senator knew the work the man has to do and the qualifications he has for it, he would not object to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No doubt if I agreed with that view and were on the committee I would vote for the retention of the services of this gentleman, if I had the privilege of voting for it. I do not know anything about him, and it is not with any view of striking at him. I simply believe that the proper way to legislate is to leave out the name and not undertake to fill the office by legislation instead of by appointment.

Mr. SMOOT. Ordinarily that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I were on the committee and the services of this man were as indicated, I would be in favor of keeping him, and I have no doubt, from what the Senator says, that his services are of that character. I do not mean at all that I am in favor of changing such an employee. I think the good of the service should be first considered and that no changes should be made where the good of the service would be sacrificed; and I merely repeat that it is not in opposition to this gentleman, because I only caught the name here this morning and had before heard nothing about it; but I do not believe in putting in names in legislation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I observe that the same thing has been done in other cases, for instance, on page 2, where Mr. Pulsifer's name has been put in. I do not know Mr. Pulsifer or Mr. Carter, either one, but I do not think it is good practice, because it makes an exception in these cases, which, I presume, is based in each of these two cases on the peculiar fitness of these gentlemen; but if they should die the place which is expressly for them would be vacant, and this appropriation being made expressly for this individual person, if the person should resign or find it expedient to separate himself from the office for any reason, it would leave no appropriation for the office, because this appropriation is made expressly for Mr. Pulsifer and Mr. Carter.

I do not think it is a good practice, and I do not think the Senate ought to follow the practice. It has been done, I know, in previous years in several cases where the officers have been of extraordinary service, and I had not been inclined to make any objection to it heretofore, but I do not think it ought to be extended. It has now been done in a number of cases. I do not think it is good practice, and I do think the Senator from Georgia is right.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there are in the House two or three cases similar to this, and I am positive good will come from this amendment if it is allowed to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How many of those are there?

Mr. SMOOT. I think there are five altogether.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. How many are there in other bills?

Mr. SMOOT. As I remember, five are all there are in all the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "House of Representatives," on page 15, line 7, after the word "each," to insert "assistant engineer, $1,200"; in line 12, before the word "laborers," to strike out "four" and insert "three"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$40,300" and insert "$40,700," so as to make the clause read:

Under Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds: Chief engineer, $1,900; 3 assistant engineers, at $1,300 each; assistant engineer, $1,200; 24 conductors of elevators, including 14 for service in the House Office Building, at $1,200 each, who shall be under the supervision and direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds; machinist, $1,300; electrician, $1,200; 3 laborers, at $800 each; in all, $40,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Library of Congress," on page 23, line 17, before the word "junior," to insert "one $540," and in line 18, after the words "in all," to strike out "$3,480" and insert "$4,020," so as to make the clause read:

Mail and delivery: Assistant in charge, $1,500; assistants—one $900, one $720, one $540; junior messenger, $360; in all, $4,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 25, to insert:

To pay Etta J. Giffin, assistant in charge of division for the blind, her salary for the months of July, August, and September, 1912, to be immediately available, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 15, after the word "each," to strike out "three" and insert "four," and, in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$100,780" and insert "$102,580," so as to make the clause read:

Copyright office, under the direction of the Librarian of Congress: Register of copyrights, $4,000; assistant register of copyrights, $3,000; clerks—4 at $2,000 each, 4 at $1,800 each, 7 at $1,600 each; 1 $1,500, 8 at $1,400 each, 10 at $1,200 each, 10 at $1,000 each; 18 at $900 each, 2 at $800 each, 10 at $720 each, 4 at $660 each, 2 at $480 each; 4 junior messengers, at $360 each. Arrears, special service: Three clerks, at $1,200 each; porter, $720; junior messenger, $360; in all, $102,580.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 11, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "seventeen"; in line 13, before the word "each," to strike out "$480" and insert "$540"; in line 16, before the word "charwomen," to strike out "forty-seven" and insert "fifty-two"; in line 17, after the word "electrician," to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,500"; and in line 20, after the words "in all," to strike out "$72,185" and insert "$75,245," so as to make the clause read:

Custody, care, and maintenance of Library building and grounds: Superintendent, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 $1,600, 1 $1,400, 1 $1,000; messenger; assistant messenger; telephone switchboard operator; assistant telephone switchboard operator; captain of watch, $1,400; lieutenant of watch, $1,000; 17 watchmen, at $720 each; carpenter, painter, and foreman of laborers, at $900 each; 14 laborers, at $540 each; 2 attendants in ladies' room, at $480 each; 4 check boys, at $360 each; mistress of charwomen, $425; assistant mistress of charwomen, $300; 52 charwomen; chief engineer, $1,500; assistant engineers—1 $1,200, 3 at $900 each; electrician, $1,500; machinists—1 $1,000, 1 $900; 2 wiremen, and 1 plumber, at $900 each; 3 elevator conductors, and 10 skilled laborers, at $720 each; in all, $75,245.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Civil Service Commission," on page 32, line 25, after the word "year," to strike out "clerks, 1 (in charge) of class 3, 2 of class 2, 3 of class 1, 1 (stenographer and typewriter), $1,000; 5 temporary clerks, at $900 each, needed for one year during the installation of the system; in all, $13,500," and insert: "For the establishment and maintenance of system of efficiency ratings for initial year, $15,000, to be immediately available. The Civil Service Commission shall investigate and report to the President, with its recommendations, as to the administrative needs of the service relating to personnel in the several executive departments and independent establishments in the District of Columbia, and report to Congress details of expenditure and of progress of work hereunder at the beginning of each regular session."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 35, line 14, after the word "care," to strike out "exchange"; in line 17, after the word "wagon," to insert "including the exchange of same"; and in the same line, after the word "harness," to insert "equipment of drivers," so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous expenses, including the purchase, care, and subsistence of horses, to be used only for official purposes, repair and maintenance of vehicles and automobile mail wagon, including the exchange of the same, harness, equipment of drivers, street-car tickets not exceeding $100, and other items not included in the foregoing, $7,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is that an automobile mail wagon?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice that the amendment below this refers to the same matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. What I wanted to inquire about was whether that could be construed so as to permit the purchase of an automobile, or is it an automobile truck that is used in handling the mail?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that the Library mail has been thus handled for the last two years. The Senator probably has seen the truck coming and going.

Mr. BRISTOW. And it is for that purpose?

Mr. WARREN. It is for that purpose. In fact, some of the carriers in cities have automobile wagons for deliveries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is the entire paragraph, carrying $7,000, limited to vehicles for Government service, or does it include vehicles for private use?

Mr. WARREN. The bill states in the body of it that they are to be used only for official purposes. If the Senator will notice lines 15 and 16 he will see that it is restricted to public use.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 37, line 17, after the words "Chief of division," to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$4,000"; in line 18, after the words "assistant chief of division," to strike out "$2,700" and insert "$3,000"; and in line 23, after the words "in all," to strike out "$87,180" and insert "$87,980," so as to make the clause read:

Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants: Chief of division, $4,000; assistant chief of division, $3,000; estimate and digest clerk, $2,500; 2 principal bookkeepers, at $2,100 each; 12 bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; clerks—14 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 6 of class 2, 3 of class 1; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $480; in all $87,980.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 5, to insert:

For purchase of furniture, adding machines, labor-saving machines, tabulating equipment, including exchange, repairs, miscellaneous expenses of installation, cards and filing devices, and for rental of tabulating and card-sorting machines, for use in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, $6,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 11, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, from the date of passage of this act until June 30, 1914, to detail such employees in the offices of Assistant Treasurers as may be necessary for duty in the District of Columbia in the office of the Treasurer of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 19, after the word "Chief," to strike out "$3,600" and insert "$4,500," and in line 23, after the words "in all," to strike out "$15,720" and insert "$16,620," so as to make the clause read:

Secret Service Division: Chief, $4,500; assistant chief, who shall discharge the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 1 of class 1, 1 at $1,000; assistant messenger; in all, $16,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 6, after the words "assay offices," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$25,000," so as to make the clause read:

For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 16, after the words "United States," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,800," so as to make the clause read:

For examinations of mints, expense in visiting mints for the purpose of superintending the annual settlements, and for special examinations, and for the collection of statistics relative to the annual production and consumption of the precious metals in the United States, $4,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 20, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 21, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; in line 22, after the words "of class 1," to insert "3, at $1,000 each"; and in line 24, after the words "in all," to strike out "$43,780" and insert "$49,780," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Surgeon General of Public Health Service: Surgeon General, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,000; private secretary to the Surgeon General, $1,800; assistant editor, $1,800; clerks—3 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 7 of class 2, one of whom shall be translator, 7 of class 1, 3 at $1,000 each; 3 at $900 each; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; 2 laborers, at $540 each; in all, $49,780.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 3, after the word "machines," to insert "and supplies for same," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of labor-saving machines and supplies for same, including the purchase and exchange of registering accountants, numbering machines, and other machines of a similar character, including time stamps for stamping date of receipt of official mail and telegrams, and repairs thereto, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to:

The next amendment was under the subhead "Collecting internal revenue," on page 58, after line 18, to insert:

On and after October 1, 1913, the whole number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and the whole number of collectors of internal revenue shall not exceed 67.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 2, after the word "storekeeper-gaugers," to strike out "$2,565,000" and insert "$2,620,000," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries and expenses of 40 revenue agents provided for by law, and fees and expenses of gaugers, salaries and expenses of storekeepers and storekeeper-gaugers, $2,620,000.

Mr. POMERENE. I note that on page 58 there is a provision to the effect that the number of collectors of internal revenue shall not exceed 67. Is that a reduction of the number?

Mr. WARREN. No. That is permission to have 4 more than there are now. I will say to the Senator that a year ago the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in making his report, called attention to the fact that there was at that time and for two years preceding at three or four offices very light receipts, and hence the House thought it best to reduce the number from 67 to 63.

Now, in some way—and I have not tried to locate where the difficulty occurred—there were 4 offices taken out which the commissioner says are among the most valuable of the lot—1 in Pennsylvania, 1 in Texas, the only 1 in South Carolina, and 1 in California. The representation from that office is that it would very sadly cripple the work if they did not have these reinstated, and so we are putting the number back where it was. Of course, it is within the province of the President to reduce the number at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 14, after the word "killed," to strike out "$90,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to make the clause read:

For rent of offices outside of the District of Columbia, telephone service, and other miscellaneous expenses incident to the collection of internal revenue, and for the purchase of necessary books of reference and periodicals for the chemical laboratory and law library, at a cost not to exceed $500, and reasonable expenses for not exceeding 60 days immediately following the injury of field officers or employees in the Internal-Revenue Service while in line of duty, of medical attendance, surgeon's and hospital bills made necessary by reason of such injury, and for horses crippled or killed while being used by officers in making raids, not exceeding $150 for any horse so crippled or killed, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Independent treasury," on page 61, line 3, before the words "vault clerk," to insert "assistant cashier, $2,000"; in line 7, before the word "nine," to strike out "2 at $1,600 each" and insert "1 $1,600"; and, in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$83,320" and insert "$83,720," so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago: Assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $3,000; assistant cashier, $2,000; vault clerk, $2,250; paying teller, $2,500; assorting teller, $2,000; redemption teller, $2,000; change teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; bookkeepers—1 at $1,800, 2 at $1,500 each; clerks—1 $1,750, 1 $1,600, 9 at $1,500 each, 22 at $1,200 each, 1 $900; hallman, $1,100; messenger, $840; 3 watchmen at $720 each; janitor, $720; 8 money counters and handlers for money laundry machines at $900 each; in all, $83,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 5, after the word "messenger," to strike out "$500" and insert "$600," and, in line 7, after the words "in all," to strike out "$32,490" and insert "$32,590," so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at St. Louis: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; vault clerk, $1,800; bookkeeper, $1,500; assorting teller, $1,200; clerks—1 $1,500, 6 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,000 each; typewriter and stenographer, $1,000; day watchman, $720; night watchman, $720; messenger, $600; 4 money counters and handlers for money laundry machines at $900 each; in all, $32,590.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Mints and assay offices," on page 64, after line 21, to insert:

Mint at Carson, Nev.: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,250; assistant assayer, $1,500; chief clerk, $1,600; clerk, $1,000; in all, $6,350.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $5,550.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 11, to insert:

Assay office at Boise, Idaho: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,250; assistant assayer, $1,600; chief clerk, who shall also perform the duties of cashier, $1,500; assayer's assistant, $1,500; clerk, $1,200; in all, $8,050.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $3,540.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $2,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 18, to insert:

Assay office at Charlotte, N. C.: Assayer and melter, $1,500.
For wages of workmen and other clerks and employees, $900.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 23, to insert:

Assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak.: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000; clerk, $1,200; assistant assayer, $1,600; assayer's assistant, $1,400; in all, $6,200.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $3,000.
For incidental and contingent expenses, new machinery, etc., $1,500.

Mr. SHIVELY. Permit me to inquire of the chairman of the committee if the amendment involves the creation of new places?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. It does not make new places. And, furthermore, it reduces the amounts under the current law in all, or nearly all, of these cases. We have not gone a penny beyond the estimate in any one particular, and the estimates are made as to nearly all of these offices on a lower basis than current law.

Mr. SHIVELY. These are not new establishments?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all; every man is in his place and every office is open, and will be until the 1st day of July, under current law.

Mr. SHIVELY. Then how does it become necessary for the Senate to act? Were these omitted in the House?

Mr. WARREN. They were. I will say they were not omitted by not having attention; they were intentionally omitted.

Mr. SHIVELY. What is the reason for their insertion here?

Mr. WARREN. I suppose they preferred that they should be inserted here. The reason for inserting them is that they are most important offices. I imagine that those who opposed them on the other side are not so located as to know the necessities for these offices. They are necessary not only for the business of to-day, but they are of immense help in the development of the country which is giving up its mineral riches to the Nation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not a fact that the Deadwood assay office is practically self-sustaining?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, that might be said of most of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, after line 5, to insert:

Assay office at Helena, Mont.: Assayer in charge, $2,500; chief clerk, who shall also perform the duties of cashier, $1,800; assistant assayer, $1,700; assayer's assistant, $1,400; clerk, $1,400; in all, $8,800.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $4,600.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Is the bill open now to amendment other than committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BORAH in the chair). It is open to amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that the bill is open to amendment from any Senator.

Mr. REED. I offer the following amendment. I would have waited until we reached the particular place in the bill, but I will not be able to stay in the Chamber very much longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 95, after line 5, insert:

To pay the expenses of a commission created by the President to investigate and make recommendation as to the necessity or desirability of establishing a national aerodynamical laboratory, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator that I think the title is aerodynamical laboratory commission. The Senator should insert the word "commission."

Mr. REED. I will accept that change if it is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment as modified is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 22, after the word "melting," to insert "and refining," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including new machinery and repairs, wastage in the melting and refining department, and loss on sale of sweeps arising from the treatment of bullion, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 69, to insert:

Assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,500; assistant assayer, $1,600; chief clerk, who shall also perform the duties of cashier, $1,600; clerk, $1,400; in all, $7,100.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $4,500.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM—VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the hour of 2 o'clock arrived?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to renew my request, so often made, for consent that a vote be taken on this joint resolution. I have had some difficulty about fixing a time, in order to meet the views of various Senators. The two who are apparently most interested are not in the Chamber at this time.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator prefer to lay aside the joint resolution temporarily, subject to his call, and call it up at some later hour, when those Senators may be here?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not feel like asking for a unanimous-consent agreement without the presence of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. Therefore, I will ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be temporarily laid aside, with the suggestion, however, that the very moment I can find both the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Vermont in the Chamber I shall call it up and ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to fix a time to vote upon it.

Mr. WARREN. I assume the Senator would ask for a roll call, so that all might be advised of it at the time——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not think I will promise that.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for no promise.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because it has been up so often and the points of objection seem to have come down to Vermont and Kansas instead of Vermont and Utah. Therefore, if I find those Senators here, I intend to present the request.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, lest the Senator from Iowa should be under any misapprehension, I want to say that I am not going to oppose fixing a date to vote upon the joint resolution at some reasonable time in the future, but I am opposed to the joint resolution in its present form. I will say to the Senator now that I shall hope that the time will not be fixed at too early a date. Does the Senator have in mind a very early date?

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say, in answer to the Senator from Missouri, that I am willing that the time shall be fixed for the 30th of the month, but the Senator from Vermont, who has a unanimous-consent agreement that follows the unfinished business, objects to that date, thinking that it ought to be fixed earlier. He tells me that he will agree that it shall be fixed for the 23d, a week from to-morrow.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is now in the Chamber, and in order to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate, so that we can have it disposed of, I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken upon this joint resolution on the legislative day of January 23, the joint resolution to be taken up for consideration immediately after the routine morning business is disposed of and continued until we reach a vote upon the joint resolution and all amendments that have been offered or may be offered to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the request of the Senator from Iowa.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that on Thursday, January 23, 1913, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and before adjournment on that legislative day will vote upon any amendments that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the joint resolution through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to make an objection, and I will not make an objection if the Senator can fix the date three or four days later. I will state my reasons for it. It is somewhat personal. I am obliged to be absent from the Senate for the next six or seven days. I am greatly interested in this question, as I think all Senators ought to be. I would not ask to have the question put off if it was merely to accommodate me personally, but if it could go a day or two longer I would be very thankful to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to meet the views of the Senator from Missouri. I am only embarrassed by the attitude which the educational bill bears toward this measure. If the Senator from Vermont will consent, I will suggest the following Tuesday; that is, the Tuesday coming after January the 23d, which will be the 28th.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would fix it for Thursday the 30th. Some Senators are likely to be away at that time. The 30th is only a week from the 23d, and it gives more time and fixes a definite date for the disposition of the joint resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I said day before yesterday, I am willing to fix the 30th, but I owe an obligation to the Senator from Vermont in regard to the matter. If he does not object to the 30th, I am willing to accept that date.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, this joint resolution, as the Senator from Iowa well knows, has stood as a block to Senate bill No. 3 since as early as August last. Now, the Senator from Missouri asks that the time be extended for a day or two beyond a week from to-morrow. If a day or two days will answer I do not think I will interpose any objection. But if the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is agreed to it puts off the consideration of Senate bill No. 3 until about the 1st of February, and we all know that at that time the appropriation bills and other matters will probably come, which would be likely to defeat the consideration of Senate bill No. 3.

It does seem to me that in view of the time the joint resolution has been before us, as it has been the blockade to other business since last August, we certainly ought to consent to fix a time, but that we should not extend it more than a day or two, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I do not understand how the joint resolution necessarily prevents the consideration of the bill the Senator from Vermont is interested in.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Missouri will turn to the calendar of to-day and observe the first unanimous-consent order, he will see how they are connected. I beg that he will read it, so that the whole Senate may understand it. I may say, however, that this is the way it stands:

> It is agreed by unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of a joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States (S. J. Res. 78), Senate bill No. 3, a bill to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, etc., be made a special order and be taken up for consideration.

The Senator from Vermont, therefore, can not bring on his bill until this joint resolution is disposed of. I am sorry he ever got himself into that position, but there it is by unanimous consent, and it can not be changed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I suggest to the Senator from Iowa, in fixing upon a date for the consideration of any of these measures, I wish it might be borne in mind that the Senate has already taken action in appointing a committee to attend the memorial services of the late Congressman WEDEMEYER, who will leave here on Saturday, the 25th, and will not be back until Monday night, the 27th. So we will be away during those two days.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are only two days really mentioned—the 23d and the 30th—and neither of them would interfere with the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Michigan. I hope very much the Senator from Vermont will find it consistent with his ideas of duty to consent to the 30th.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to say to the Senator from Vermont, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I was talking with a Senator this morning who is interested in the measure, and he said the 30th would be perfectly safe for him, that he would be back by that time, but he did not want it set for an earlier date. The date suggested by the Senator from Missouri would be Tuesday, the 28th. It is only two days from the 28th to the 30th, and while it might make no difference in the consideration of the joint resolution, it will make a difference in the return of Senators who are away.

Mr. PAGE. If it might be agreed by the unanimous consent that we shall vote upon Senate bill No. 3 on the 3d day of February, I would be content with the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not believe that the fixing of a date for voting upon this joint resolution ought to be a matter of trade with any other measure pending before the Senate. I think that would be distinctly inappropriate.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I have a rather special interest in this joint resolution, having introduced the joint resolution in its original form that was reported back from the Judiciary Committee. The joint resolution has been pending here for months as the unfinished business, going away back into the last session of Congress. I have been waiting patiently to have it brought to a vote, and I do hope that the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Kansas can harmonize their views on this subject so that we may get it to a vote at an early day. I think to put it off until the 30th is longer than it should be delayed, but I am willing to consent to that if it can be agreed upon. However, I think the request of the Senator from Kansas that it shall be postponed until that date is rather unreasonable. It could certainly be fully discussed before that time, and unless there is some special reason for not fixing an earlier date I hope that date will not be insisted upon.

Mr. BRISTOW. It was to suit the desires of some Senators who do not expect to be able to be present during the early part of that week.

Mr. WORKS. The trouble about it is that there are too many Senators who are not here when these matters should be determined, and we are compelled from time to time to postpone the consideration and voting upon measures that ought to be disposed of because some Senators are absent from the Senate. I do not regard that as a very good reason, unless there is some imperative reason for a Senator to be absent. I do not know what the facts may be in this case.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not inquired of the Senator whether he had a good reason for being away. I did not think that that was within my province. He said he would have to be away, and I accepted his word for it.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, if he thinks it proper to do so, to withhold his request for a vote and let me prefer a request to the Senate that it give unanimous consent that my bill shall be taken up on the 3d of February.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The objection to that is this: We can not tell just how long the discussion of the constitutional amendment will take. I am perfectly willing to consent that immediately after disposing of the constitutional amendment on the next legislative day we shall take up the bill of the Senator from Vermont, but that we should agree now that we should dispose of Senate bill No. 3 on February 3, and take up the constitutional amendment on February 1, and we may not have it finished by February 3 or until sometime during February 3, it might leave no time for the discussion of the bill of the Senator from Vermont. It is not my desire to hinder the consideration of that bill. I wish we were able to consider it as soon as we have finished the pending appropriation bill. I will be glad to have it heard as soon as possible, but I do not think we ought to put our agreement in such a shape that it might leave us with no opportunity whatever to discuss that bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I will do everything in my power to aid the Senator in securing a vote upon the bill to which he refers, but I do not think I ought to withdraw this request for the purpose of having him submit another, understanding that if he is not successful in his request he intends to object to the one that I have proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Vermont will put his request in the shape of a consent that Senate bill No. 3 shall be disposed of during the next legislative day after the disposal of the constitutional amendment, I would not object. I desire merely to have it so arranged that we may be sure we will have an opportunity to consider that bill.

Mr. PAGE. I shall be very glad, indeed, to submit that request. It does seem to me as though it would not interfere with the Senator from Iowa, if all others are willing, that on the next legislative day the Senate shall take up my bill, and that it be agreed to at this time.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we are now in the middle of this session of Congress. We have not passed a single appropriation bill. There are 16 bills, including the river and harbor and public building bills, that are already begun or will be enacted in the House. All these must be considered in the Senate. I do not think there should be any unanimous-consent agreement to take up a matter and finish it on some legislative day which may run two or three weeks, unless the consideration of appropriation bills is excepted and those special orders not to interfere with consideration of any of these great supply bills.

I have no factious opposition to offer. I want to facilitate business. I want all the appropriation bills to pass and I want these other measures to have full attention.

If it should be proposed to vote upon the calendar day of the 20th, or at some hour the Senate would commence voting and finish in that day; but even then we ought to except the appropriation bills. I think it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the condition we are in.

I wish to say, furthermore, that no committee of the Senate can be blamed for the tardiness of the appropriation bills. The reasons are obvious. We have been tied up as a court. Senators had, in duty to their conscience and their constituents, to act as a jury. They have been forbidden to leave the Chamber except for a few moments at a time. The legislative appropriation bill, which is the most complicated of all, was reported on the very day that we had decided on finishing the other matter, so there can be no just criticism of the committee.

I think there should be help from all sides to the various committees. I do not speak for the Committee on Appropriations alone, but here are the Army appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, the agricultural appropriation bill, and others that all Senators are interested in. I beg them to take this into consideration, and in fixing dates to except the appropriation bills. As far as I am concerned, with those which I have charge of, I will say that I shall try to stand in no Senator's way, and I shall try to facilitate the business of the Senate.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I should be very glad indeed to make the exception suggested by the Senator from Wyoming—that this bill shall not interfere with appropriation bills—if I may do so safely.

Mr. President, with that exception I ask unanimous consent that on the next legislative day following the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 78, immediately at the conclusion of that, we shall take up Senate bill No. 3, and that not later than the conclusion of that legislative day the Senate shall proceed without further debate to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, or amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. WARREN. My attention was diverted. Did the Senator except the consideration of appropriation bills?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly; I except the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. WARREN. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the matter before the Senate is the request preferred by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand the Senator from Vermont really adds that to the request I made, so that it may all be adopted at the same time.

Mr. PAGE. I am perfectly willing that that shall be done.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Iowa, as long as we give so much time, make it the calendar day and finish it up on that day?

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that I have tried to do that, and I meet with objection. Therefore I am driven to the legislative day. But there is no reason why it should take up a very great deal of time.

Mr. WARREN. I have no interest except what other Senators have.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand the embarrassment of the various committees.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the request of the Senator from Vermont.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that on Thursday, January 30, 1913, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and before adjournment on that legislative day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the joint resolution, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

Further, that on the day following the disposition of Senate joint resolution 78, and immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business on that day, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3, to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and so forth, and that before adjournment on that day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition; such consideration, however, not to interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not the agreement. I can not accept that, Mr. President. The Secretary did not read "legislative day." He said "on that day" as to Senate bill 3.

The SECRETARY. In the second paragraph read "and that before adjournment on that legislative day."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. There is at present a unanimous-consent agreement that Senate bill 3 shall be made a special order and taken up for consideration immediately after the disposition of joint resolution 78. Is not the proposition now, in fact, a variation of that unanimous-consent agreement previously made, and if it is a variation, can it be made by unanimous consent?

I am not doing this, I want to say, to bar the Senator from Vermont from the right to have his bill considered, because I think he has been very patient, long suffering, slow to wrath, and of great kindness, but I do think that we are in a doubtful position.

Mr. SMOOT. Very doubtful, indeed.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does change the present situation very much. In the first place, there is no unanimous consent upon this joint resolution, and, in the second place, there is no unanimous consent at the present time for a vote upon Senate bill 3.

Mr. SMOOT. There is, however, a unanimous-consent agreement that Senate bill No. 3 shall follow immediately after the disposition of the joint resolution; that it shall be made a special order and be taken up for consideration immediately thereafter.

Mr. CUMMINS. But not to proceed to vote.

Mr. SMOOT. No. The unanimous-consent agreement asked for now is a change in that unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the only addition to the unanimous-consent agreement now standing.

Mr. SMOOT. No unanimous consent can be changed by a unanimous consent. It was so held the other day.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This does not conflict with it in the slightest degree.

Mr. SMOOT. It is adding to it and making a change.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Both can stand without conflicting with each other.

Mr. REED. But there is a conflict, because it makes——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. REED. It does conflict, because it now interjects the proposition to make it subject to the consideration of the appropriation bills, which is an absolute modification of the present unanimous consent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me that there is absolutely no conflict between the unanimous-consent order that has already been entered and the one which is now requested. The unanimous-consent agreement now is that at the conclusion of the consideration of this joint resolution Senate bill No. 3 shall be made a special order and be taken up for consideration. That unanimous-consent agreement would be entirely satisfied if immediately after the disposition of the joint resolution the Senate would proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 3 for five minutes and then adjourn. That would be the end of that unanimous-consent agreement.

Now, the request is, first, by unanimous consent to take up the joint resolution and vote upon it before the end of the legislative day of January 30, and then upon the day following that, to take up Senate bill No. 3 for consideration and vote before the end of that legislative day. So, before the second subdivision of this unanimous-consent agreement is entered upon the unanimous-consent agreement already upon the calendar will have been disposed of. I can not see that there is any conflict whatsoever.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that while his suggestion is correct, if the bill the Senator from Vermont is interested in should be considered briefly and then the Senate should take up something else it would be displaced, but if it is considered during the day it then becomes the unfinished business. So the Senator from Vermont does not lose his rights because of that fact.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; but the point I make is that there is no conflict between the two.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I think not, either.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senate may certainly unanimously agree to do a particular thing and then unanimously agree to do something in addition to that particular thing. It can not agree by unanimous consent to do something in conflict with a unanimous-consent agreement. That is the point I am making.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question, if he will permit me. I do not agree with the Senator's last suggestion, but is not this the situation: We absolutely agree in the present unanimous-consent arrangement that at the conclusion of the consideration of joint resolution No. 78 we will consider Senate bill No. 3? That is unqualified and absolute and positive. Now, it is proposed to say we will consider it subject to appropriation bills. That is a qualification distinctly taking away from the previous agreement, so that, as the resolution now stands, it would be our duty to take up that matter and consider it. If the proposition now before the Senate is agreed to, then we would not be in the position of unqualifiedly taking it up, but we would take it up subject to the superior and dominant rights of appropriation bills. I ask the Senator if he does not think that is the situation? I want to get it right; that is all.

Mr. PAGE. Allow me——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me to answer the question, I was not directing my suggestions to that particular phase of the matter, the Senator will recall. I think there is much in the suggestion which the Senator now makes. Perhaps in that particular it may be regarded as a change or modification of the present unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to make this further suggestion to the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that it might be well if he would withdraw that part of his request.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if there is not this further trouble: We go to bill No. 3 under a unanimous-consent agreement that we will continue upon it during the legislative day until it is finished; we also have the exception that appropriation bills can come in at any time and stop it. We might be on appropriation bills and this bill, then, for a number of days without any morning hour. We would take the appropriation bills, then, in that legislative day, and we would have to finish the appropriation bills also during the legislative day. The injection of appropriation bills into the agreement would cause us a great deal of confusion.

Now, I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator from Vermont: I want to say to him that there is not the slightest desire on this side to stop action on this bill——

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. All I desire is that we should have just a few hours to discuss it. We can take it up at once; but it is stopped by the joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment. If we set a day and get rid of the joint resolution relative to the constitutional amendment, then the bill of the Senator from Vermont becomes the unfinished business; we can take it up the very next day at 2 o'clock; and we shall have from 2 o'clock to 4 o'clock, and in all probability can finish it. As there is no desire to prolong debate and no desire to interfere with it, I do not really think it needs any unanimous consent at all to secure consideration.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. PAGE. I want to say that, in view of the very kindly attitude toward my bill, I want to withdraw my request.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now I ask that the request which I made may be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. I simply want to find out what date was fixed for a vote, whether it was the 25th or the 30th.

Mr. CUMMINS. January 30.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this unanimous-consent agreement has not been passed upon, has it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been.

Mr. REED. In what form? I stopped and turned to answer a question. I thought I was watching the proceedings, and I should like to know what has been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the request of the Senator from Iowa, which has been agreed to.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, January 30, 1913, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 78, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and before adjournment on that legislative day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the resolution, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

Mr. REED. The agreement only applies to one measure?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is all.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa now ask to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside?

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of the unanimous consent just given, I ask that the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Government in the Territories," on page 69, line 16, before the words "of Alaska," to strike out "District" and insert "Territory," so as to make the clause read:

Territory of Alaska: Governor, $7,000; 4 judges, at $7,500 each; 4 attorneys, at $5,000 each; 4 marshals, at $4,000 each; 4 clerks, at $3,500 each; in all, $87,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 23, after the word "business," to strike out "rent of offices and quarters in Juneau" and insert "repair and preservation of executive mansion," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental and contingent expenses, clerk hire, not to exceed $2,250; janitor service, not to exceed $900; traveling expenses of the governor while absent from Juneau on official business; repair and preservation of executive mansion, stationery, lights, and fuel, to be expended under the direction of the governor, $7,150.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I want to inquire why the words "repair and preservation of executive mansion" are employed? Is that a Government building now? Have we had a Government building constructed at Juneau within the last year?

Mr. WARREN. There is a building erected there. It was impossible to rent proper quarters, and appropriations were made for the building. I think it is called the executive mansion.

Mr. SHIVELY. Is this building owned by the Government?

Mr. WARREN. It is owned by the Government.

Mr. SHIVELY. And has been procured within the last year?

Mr. WARREN. No; it was provided for, I think, two years ago and has since been erected. That is my remembrance.

Mr. SHIVELY. I notice that in the current appropriation—that is, the appropriation for the present year—provision is simply made for rent.

Mr. WARREN. We took that provision out, because we presumed when we appropriated last year, though we were not certain, that they would have to pay rent for a part of the year; but now I assume that they have moved in and that it is not necessary to further provide for rent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Wyoming allow me to ask him a question, as I was absent attending a committee meeting, and therefore do not know just what has happened?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senate now adopting any part of this bill or simply the amendments offered by the committee?

Mr. WARREN. The Senate is adopting or rejecting all amendments of the committee, and it is also considering amendments offered by Senators.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the whole bill will be open for amendment after the present order?

Mr. WARREN. I, of course, shall not object to a reasonable turning back, if it be necessary, to accommodate Senators.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. I assume that the Senator does not want to go back and reconsider, but to go back——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that I want to go back at all; but there is an amendment that I desire to offer on page 87.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have not reached that point.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator can offer his amendment at any time he wishes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will wait until the committee amendments are finished, because I think the committee ought to have its chance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Without objection, the pending committee amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 70, after line 2, to insert:

For legislative expenses, namely: Salaries of members, $21,600; mileage of members, $6,500; salaries of employees, $5,160; printing of laws, $5,000; rent of legislative halls and committee rooms, $2,000; stationery, supplies, printing of bills, reports, etc., $5,000; in all, $45,260, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 18, after the sum "$2,000," to insert "for traveling expenses of the governor while absent from the capital on official business, $500," and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500," so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the Territory of Hawaii, to be expended by the governor for stationery, postage, and incidentals, $1,000, and for private secretary to the governor, $2,000; for traveling expenses of the governor while absent from the capital on official business, $500; in all, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "War Department," on page 70, line 23, after the sum "$5,000," to insert "assistant and chief clerk, $4,000," and, on page 71, after the words "in all," at the end of line 16, to strike out "$144,160" and insert "$148,160," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of War, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; assistant and chief clerk, $4,000; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary, $2,000; stenographer to the Secretary, $2,000; clerk to the Assistant Secretary, $2,400; assistant chief clerk, $2,400; disbursing clerk, $2,750; appointment clerk, $2,250; four chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; superintendent of buildings outside of State, War, and Navy Department Building, in addition to compensation as chief of division, $500; chief telegrapher, $1,800; clerks—4 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 15 of class 2, 19 of class 1, 6 at $1,000 each, 1 $900; foreman, $1,200; carpenter, $1,200; chief messenger, $1,000; carpenter, $1,080; skilled laborer, $1,080; 6 messengers; 7 assistant messengers; 2 assistant messengers, at $600 each; telephone switchboard operator; assistant telephone switchboard operator; engineer, $900; assistant engineer, $720; fireman; 4 watchmen; 5 watchmen, at $660 each; 8 laborers; hostlers—1 $600, 1 at $540; elevator conductors—1 at $600; 4 charwomen; in all, $148,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 74, line 11, after the words "Chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250"; in line 13, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "eleven" and insert "thirteen"; in the same line, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "twenty-four"; and in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$166,108" and insert "$166,758," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Surgeon General: Chief clerk, $2,250; law clerk, $2,000; clerks—13 of class 4, 13 of class 3, 24 of class 2, 32 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; anatomist, $1,600; engineer, $1,400; 3 firemen; skilled mechanic, $1,000; 2 messengers; 10 assistant messengers; 3 watchmen; superintendent of building (Army Medical Museum and Library), $250; 6 laborers; chemist, $2,088; assistant chemist, $1,500; principal assistant librarian, $2,250; pathologist, $1,800; microscopist, $1,800; assistant librarian, $1,800; 4 charwomen; in all, $166,758.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 75, line 18, after the words "Chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250," and in line 23, after the words "in all," to strike out "$103,820" and insert "$104,070," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Chief of Engineers: Chief clerk, $2,250; 2 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; clerks—8 of class 4, 11 of class 3, 13 of class 2, 16 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each, 11 at $900 each; 6 messengers; 3 assistant messengers; 2 laborers; in all, $104,070.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 16, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "three" and insert "seven"; in the same line, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven"; in line 17, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "nineteen" and insert "fourteen"; and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$88,430" and insert "$90,230," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Bureau of Insular Affairs: Law officer, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,250; clerks—10 of class 4, 7 of class 3, 11 of class 2, 14 of class 1, 15 at $1,000 each; 3 messengers; 2 assistant messengers; 4 laborers; 2 charwomen; in all, $90,230.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk, and I desire to say a word in reference to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 79, line 20, before the word "each," it is proposed to strike out "$720" and to insert in lieu thereof "$900," and on page 80, line 8, before the word "each," to strike out "$720" and to insert in lieu thereof "$900."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, my amendment relates to what are called park watchmen, more properly park policemen, and I want to read just a few words from a report made by Col. Spencer Cosby, who is in charge of the parks here. He says:

The Washington park policeman is probably the poorest paid man in the United States who has police duty to perform. He has practically the same duties to perform as the Metropolitan police. The same intelligence and physical qualifications are required of him. His moral character must be good; his discipline is much the same. He has as many arrests to make as the average policeman. He runs the same risks as to injury from vicious people as the man doing duty on the street. * * * He has a uniform to buy once a year in order to look neat, and yet the pay of these policemen is only $60 per month. The Government requires the street railway companies to pay their crossing police officers $75 per month for a great deal less exacting and laborious duty.

The fact is, Mr. President, that at the last session the pay of crossing policemen was increased to $100 per month, which they are now receiving. In a letter from Col. Cosby to the Committee on the District of Columbia, dated December 14, 1912, he says:

I desire to call the special attention of your committee to the changes asked for under the head of park watchmen, and to the request that the designation be changed to park police. In my last annual report is contained the following statement:

"The park watchmen receive only $60 a month and their uniforms, the allowance for which amounts to a little less than $5 per month. I do not know of any other men doing police duty in a large city who are as poorly paid. The Metropolitan police of this city, the crossing police, and the Capitol police all receive much higher salaries. This inequality should be removed and the pay of the park watchmen increased."

I believe it would be only fair and equitable to increase the pay of the privates of park police to $900 per year each.

The fact is, Mr. President, and I have a pretty correct knowledge of this matter, that here are men performing police duty and working long hours, and they are paid the miserable pittance of $60 per month. How on earth they live is beyond my comprehension. I should very much like to have this amendment agreed to and let it go into conference. If it fails, then I have done my duty and the Senate has done its duty. I trust that it will be permitted to become an amendment to the bill, and that it will be looked into very carefully before the bill finally becomes a law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that the record may be straight, I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that on page 80 there is a provision appropriating $2,800 "for purchasing and supplying uniforms to park, monument, and bridge watchmen." I do not know that the Senator's attention has been called to that. I understand that these employees do not furnish their uniforms, but they are furnished out of the appropriation to which I have just called the Senator's attention.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is news to me, for the reason that Col. Cosby states that they do purchase their uniforms; but whether they do or not, admitting that their uniforms are furnished—and it is possible that some change may have been made in the last year or two—admitting that to be the fact, I submit that to ask men to go into our parks to guard the parks and to arrest offenders, to risk their lives, and to work long hours for $60 a month at the present cost of living is bordering on what I think is inhuman.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply called the attention of the Senator to this matter so that the record might be straight, not that I objected to the increase.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad the Senator did so. I was not aware of the fact to which he called attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Navy Department," on page 82, line 2, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 3, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "five" and insert "six"; and in line 8, after the words "in all," to strike out "$75,060" and insert "$77,660," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of the Navy, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of the Navy, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,000; private secretary to Secretary, $2,500; clerk to Secretary, $2,250; clerk to Assistant Secretary, $2,000; disbursing clerk, $2,250; stenographer, $1,800; clerks—4 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 6 of class 1; 1, $1,100; 4 at $1,000 each; stenographer, $1,200; telegraph operator, $1,100; 2 copyists; carpenter, $900; 4 messengers; 4 assistant messengers; 3 laborers; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each; messenger boy, $420; messenger boy, $400; telephone switchboard operator; assistant telephone switchboard operator; in all, $77,660.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 23, after the figures "$2,000," to insert "chief clerk, $1,800," and in line 25, before the word "one," to strike out "two at $1,600 each," and insert "one $1,600," so as to read:

Hydrographic Office: Hydrographic engineer, $3,000; assistant, $2,200; assistant, $2,000; chief clerk, $1,800; nautical experts—one $1,800, one $1,600, one $1,400, three at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 17, to change the total from $102,700 to $102,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 86, line 13, after the word "publications," to insert "books of reference," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of copperplates, steel plates, chart paper, packing boxes, chart portfolios, electrotyping copperplates, cleaning copperplates; tools, instruments, power, materials for drawing, engraving, and printing; materials for and mounting charts; reduction of charts by photography; photolithographing charts for immediate use; transfer of photolithographic and other charts to copper; care and repairs to printing presses, furniture, instruments, and tools; extra drawing and engraving; translating from foreign languages; telegrams on public business; the preparation of Pilot Charts and their supplements, and the printing and mailing of the same; purchase of data for charts and sailing directions and other nautical publications; books of reference, works and periodicals relating to hydrography, marine meteorology, navigation, surveying, oceanography, and terrestrial magnetism, $26,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 4, after the word "established," to strike out "$11,000" and insert "$14,000," so as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses of branch offices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Savannah, New Orleans, San Francisco, Portland (Oreg.), Portland (Me.), Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo, Duluth, Sault Ste. Marie, Seattle, Panama, and Galveston, including furniture, fuel, lights, works and periodicals relating to hydrography, marine meteorology, navigation, surveying, oceanography, and terrestrial magnetism, stationery, miscellaneous articles, rent and care of offices, care of time balls, car fare and ferriage in visiting merchant vessels, freight and express charges, telegrams, and other necessary expenses incurred in collecting the latest information for the Pilot Charts, and for other purposes for which the offices were established, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 5, after the word "offices," to strike out "$17,960" and insert $22,000," so as to make the clause read:

For services of necessary employees at branch offices, $22,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 87.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 87, at the end of line 25, it is proposed to insert:

The Hydrographic Office shall not be removed to the building and grounds of the Naval Observatory.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as that is not estimated for and is new legislation, perhaps the Senator would like to give us his reasons, because otherwise, should the amendment go to conference, we would be without any basis for discussing it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, there is no estimate for it, because it does not involve any appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me before he proceeds, I will say that we left out what might have been considered an appropriation to effect the removal of that office. There is no appropriation in the bill for its removal.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am advised that it is now in the power of the President or of some other officer of the Government to remove the Hydrographic Office to the building of the Naval Observatory. I know that there has been such an enterprise on foot. I have given the matter a good deal of investigation, and I am deeply convinced that it would greatly interfere with the value of the work done at the Naval Observatory if it were combined with the Hydrographic Office. I want therefore to put it out of the power of any department, at least pending these appropriations, to make that removal and consolidation.

It is obvious to anyone who is familiar with the subject that there is nothing whatsoever in common between the work of the Hydrographic Office and the work of the Naval Observatory or the work connected with the Ephemeris or the Nautical Almanac, and I have become persuaded that it would be most injurious to this institution if the proposed consolidation or removal were brought about. For that reason I have offered the amendment just read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 88, line 3, before the word "assistant," to strike out "2, at $1,800 each" and insert "1 $2,000, 1 $1,800"; in line 7, before the word "each," to strike out "$1,600" and insert "$1,200"; and in line 10, after the words "in all," to strike out "$43,640" and insert "$44,240," so as to make the clause read:

Naval Observatory: Assistant astronomers—1 $2,400, 1 $2,000, 1 $1,800; assistant in department of nautical instruments, $1,600; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 2; instrument maker, $1,500; electrician, $1,500; librarian, $1,800; assistants—3 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,400 each, two at $1,200 each; stenographer and typewriter, $900; foreman and captain of the watch, $1,000; carpenter and engineer, at $1,000 each; 5 firemen; 6 watchmen; elevator conductor, $720; 9 laborers; in all, $44,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 13, after the word "books," to insert "books of reference," so as to make the clause read:

For professional and scientific books, books of reference, periodicals (subscriptions to periodicals may be paid in advance), engravings, photographs, and fixtures for the library, $750.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, to come in on page 89.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 89, line 8, after the sum "$2,000," it is proposed to insert "who may hereafter act as or be appointed director."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is not estimated for, and I notice in the hearings before the House committee the officials who appeared there from the department objected to its going in. I have no factious opposition to offer, but I want the Senator to know the situation. The House had before them only the fact that it was not requested nor desired by the department.

Mr. JONES. In the hearings the Senator will remember that Capt. Jayne simply said that these words were in the last bill, but were not put in at the request of the department, and they did not consider them necessary. That was the only objection they made to it. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment. I am satisfied that the House will concur in the amendment, because it was understood, I am informed, that the language we put in the bill last year was considered permanent. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was called from the Chamber at the time we passed page 83, and I should like to return to that page a moment for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the subject of the Naval Observatory and Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac, embraced in the provisions of the bill now before the Senate, I wish to suggest to the chairman of the committee that I intend to offer an amendment before the time is past for offering amendments striking out the word "Naval" and inserting the word "National," so that it will be the "National Observatory" instead of the "Naval Observatory." I will also offer an amendment transferring the National Observatory to the Department of Commerce and Labor, instead of allowing it to remain under the Navy Department, where it now is.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course, I do not want to say what I will do when the amendment is offered, but while I might not raise any objection to the change in the name, it seems to me that a matter so important as changing the department under which the Naval Observatory is to be administered ought to be considered in a measure outside of an appropriation bill, because, if we proceed in that way with appropriation bills we shall hardly find an end.

Mr. CUMMINS. I concede the force of the statement just made by the Senator from Wyoming; but is it not fair that we legislate on some subjects on appropriation bills and then restrict ourselves as to others. We have fallen into the habit of doing this thing. I am perfectly willing to abandon the habit; but so long as we are pursuing it I do not feel any moral wrong in participating in it, and I am so thoroughly convinced that the name "Naval Observatory" is a misnomer and so thoroughly convinced that it is very inadequate for the work which it is supposed to do that I desire to begin at least a campaign to make the observatory what it ought to be. It has no more relation to the Navy than it has to the Army.

Mr. PERKINS. Naval officers are in charge of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Naval officers happen to be in charge of it, as suggested by my friend from California; but I do not think that necessarily naval officers ought to be in charge of it. I think it ought to be in the hands of distinguished scientists.

Mr. ROOT. Did it not grow from the Navy?

Mr. CUMMINS. The work which it does, or ought to do, is of practically no importance in the preparation of the Ephemeris or the Nautical Almanac. It is popularly supposed there is a very intimate connection between the work of the observatory and the work of the Ephemeris and the Almanac. I do not believe this is true. I believe that the observatory ought to be a purely scientific institution, carried on for the purpose of making observations not for our own use alone but for the use of the world, and in the end we will put the observatory in the hands of men who have demonstrated their qualifications for that kind of work, as other nations have already put their observatories into the hands of such scientists.

Mark you, I am not in any wise impeaching or even criticizing the management of the Naval Observatory or the skill or knowledge of the men who are connected with it. I only say that it is founded on a false principle, and I intend to do what little I can do to remove it from the sphere which I think it ought not to occupy.

I can not, however, offer the amendments which I have suggested at this moment. I did not believe that we would reach this part of the bill so soon, and therefore I have not prepared them; but before there is any adoption by the Senate of these two pages I desire to have an opportunity to present the amendments which I have outlined to the chairman of the committee and to the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 83, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "1 of class 2" and insert in lieu thereof "1 of class 3"; and also, in line 23, to strike out "$12,100" and insert "$12,300."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator wishes to raise the salary of one clerk.

Mr. TOWNSEND. To raise his salary $200, as estimated for by the department.

Mr. WARREN. That is estimated for, and there is no objection on the part of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words regarding the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I may not be here when he offers the amendment of which he has given notice, so that I will speak now. I do not know whether I would be in favor of such an amendment or not. I think it may be that it would be advisable, but I do not know, and I do not think the Senate can know that fact as the result merely of a discussion on the floor.

It seems to me that the proposal of so radical a change in the management of an institution which has grown up in one department, which has been under the direction of that department for many years, ought to be presented at such a time that it can be referred to the appropriate committee, and that the committee may inquire into the subject, call before them the representatives of the different departments involved, and come to a deliberate judgment which they can report to the Senate, as to whether this change or any such change ought to be made.

I do not believe we ought to step in, upon an amendment offered on the floor, never having been referred to a committee, and undertake to make such a change. I do not think we ought to consider it.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from New York allow me?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want now to discuss this question of the Naval Observatory. It is a very large question, and the amendment, which I understand the Senator from Iowa has suggested but not offered, would, of course, be clearly out of order as proposing general legislation and totally changing existing law. It is a subject that has been much discussed in past years, and Congress, on the whole, has thought it best to leave the observatory where it is.

There are certain functions of the Naval Observatory that are purely naval—the care of the chronometers and things of that sort—and it is too large a subject to be dealt with on an amendment offered without warning on an appropriation bill. There is a great deal to be said on both sides, I recognize. I have been familiar with the question for a great many years, and I think it would require a great deal of discussion before being acted upon. The proposition ought to be in the form of a bill, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] suggests, and go to the proper committee, so that the matter could be heard. We have had those hearings before, and they have generally resulted in leaving the matter where it was. A similar change was tried in France. They took the observatory out of naval hands and put it into civilian hands, and in a very short time they put it back again. So it does not follow that it is always wise to take such a step. I merely say this now because I want to give notice that if anything of that sort is contemplated it would, in my opinion, lead necessarily to a very great deal of discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS obtained the floor.

Mr. ROOT. May I say one word more?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. If this subject were to be acted upon I should want to have the Senate consider whether the institution ought to be put under the charge of the Department of Commerce and Labor or whether it should not be put under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, which is really the scientific branch of the Government of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should much prefer that it should go under the charge of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. ROOT. I should think that would be very much to be preferred.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I realize the force of the statements made by the Senator from New York, they are somewhat impaired possibly or the objections are somewhat met by the immediately following statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, in which he said, and said very correctly, that this matter has been before Congress a great many times and in a great many phases; and I assume that most Senators have given the subject some investigation. I do not want to take time just now, but I suppose the consideration of this bill will not be concluded to-day, and I will have my amendment ready to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. I hope it may be concluded to-day.

If the Senator will permit me, in addition to what has been said, this bill provides for certain employees specifically, and there are certain employees that you might say are quasi Naval Observatory and quasi Navy Department proper, and if such a change is to be made there should have been notice before the committee long ago, so that hearings could be had and the financial part of it arranged.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think there would be any difficulty about that, and I think the Senator from Wyoming will agree with me, save in one respect. I agree that if my amendments were to prevail, and nothing more were done, it would leave the observatory without a director, the present director being, of course, a naval officer, who receives compensation, I assume, through the ordinary channels of his rank. But I think that could be easily taken care of.

Mr. LODGE. I will say further that the question of separating the Naval Observatory from the Navy Department, is, of course, a subject that pertains to naval affairs, and has always been so recognized. This provides merely for the clerical and astronomical force there, but the Naval Observatory is part of the Naval Establishment, and would have to be dealt with in connection with the Navy. I have never known the change to be proposed on this bill; it has always been on the naval bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 92, line 11, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "one" and insert "two," and in line 24, after the words "in all," to strike out "$18,550" and insert "$19,950," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Medicine and Surgery: Chief clerk, $2,250; clerks—2 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 1 of class 1, 2 at $1,100 each, 3 at $1,000 each; copyist, $840; assistant messenger; laborer; driver for naval dispensary, $600; laborer for naval dispensary, $480; in all, $19,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, after line 12, to strike out:

For the rental of the Mills Building during the fiscal year 1914, $24,500.

And insert:

For the rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, $31,200, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the rental of a suitable fireproof building or buildings or parts thereof for the use of the Navy Department for a period of not exceeding 10 years from July 1, 1913, at an annual rental of not exceeding $31,200.

The amount heretofore appropriated for the rental of the Mills Building for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, is hereby made available for the rental of the Mills Building or any other building or buildings or parts thereof for the Navy Department for the period from April 1 to June 30, 1913, and the additional sum of $1,675, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated for the same purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of the Interior," in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the Secretary of the Interior, on page 95, line 24, after the words "chief disbursing clerk," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,750"; on page 96, line 3, before the words "of class 3" to strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen," so as to read:

Chief disbursing clerk, $2,750; clerk in charge of supplies, $2,250; clerk in charge of mails, files, and archives, $2,250; clerk in charge of publications, $2,250; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerks—4, at $2,000 each; 13 of class 4, 19 of class 3,

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the Secretary of the Interior, on page 96, line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$275,570" and insert "$277,670," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant engineer, $1,000; 7 firemen; clerk to sign, under the direction of the Secretary, in his name and for him, his approval of all tribal deeds to allottees and deeds for town lots made and executed according to law for any of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory, $1,200; in all, $277,670.

The amendment was agreed to.

Bureau of Standards: Director, $6,000; physicists—chief, $4,800, 1 qualified in optics, $3,600, 2 at $3,600 each, 1 $3,000; associate physicists—3 at $2,700 each, 4 at $2,500 each, 4 at $2,200 each, 5 at $2,000 each; assistant physicists—9 at $1,800 each, 11 at $1,600 each, 14 at $1,400 each; chief chemist, $4,800; chemist, $3,500; associate chemists—1 $2,700, 2 at $2,500 each, 1 $2,200, 1 $2,000; assistant chemists—2 at $1,800 each, 3 at $1,600 each, 2 at $1,400 each; laboratory assistants—16 at $1,200 each, 13 at $1,000 each; 13 at $900 each; laboratory helpers—1 $840, 3 at $720 each; aids—10 at $720 each, 7 at $600 each; laboratory apprentices—6 at $540 each, 6 at $480 each; storekeeper, $1,000; librarian, $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 137, line 2, after the word "firemen," to strike out "two glass blowers, at $1,400 each" and insert "glass blower, $1,400; glassworker, $1,400," and in line 6, after the words "in all," to strike out "$290,740" and insert "$290,940," so as to make the clause read:

Pipe fitter, $1,000; 4 firemen; glass blower, $1,400; glassworker, $1,400; electricians—1 $1,200, 1 $900; 6 laborers; janitors—2 at $660 each, 1 $600; 2 female laborers, at $360 each; in all, $290,940.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 139, line 19, after the figures "$25,000," to insert "to be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of storage batteries, transformers, switchboards, and other necessary equipment of the new electrical laboratory, $25,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 140, line 22, after the words "amounting to," to strike out "$66,500" and insert "$68,500," so as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor: For contingent and miscellaneous expenses, * * * $68,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor, on page 141, line 14, before the word "expenses," to insert "enforcement of wireless-communication laws, $2,000," and in line 18, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$126,500" and insert "$128,500," so as to make the clause read:

Steamboat-Inspection Service, $3,000; contingent expenses, shipping service, $500; instruments for measuring vessels and counting passengers, $500; enforcement of wireless-communication laws, $2,000; expenses of regulating immigration, $13,500; equipment, Bureau of Standards, $1,000; general expenses, Bureau of Standards, $1,800; general expenses, Coast and Geodetic Survey, $4,200; miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Fisheries, $8,500; and the said total sum of $128,500 shall be and constitute the appropriation for contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 142, after line 3, to insert:

The accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of William L. Soleau, former disbursing clerk, Department of Commerce and Labor, the sum of $99.63, disallowed by the Auditor for the State and Other Departments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 144, after line 11, to insert:

Commerce Court: For the Commerce Court, from March 5 to June 30, 1913, both dates inclusive, namely: Clerk, at the rate of $4,000 per annum; deputy clerk, at the rate of $2,500 per annum; marshal, at the rate of $3,000 per annum; deputy marshal, at the rate of $2,500 per annum; for rent of necessary quarters in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and furnishing same for the Commerce Court; for books, periodicals, stationery, printing, and binding; for pay of bailiffs and all other necessary employees at the seat of government and elsewhere, not otherwise specifically provided for, and for such other miscellaneous expenses as may be approved by the presiding judge, $16,111.11; in all, $19,977.78, to be immediately available.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit, perhaps we had better finish the remainder of the bill, if it is agreeable to the Senator, and then return to this amendment.

Mr. DIXON. I want to make a motion to strike out the item concerning the Commerce Court on page 144.

Mr. WARREN. Let us pass it for the time being.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; let us complete the remainder of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it agreed that the pending amendment shall be passed over?

Mr. WARREN. Pass it over for a moment, and let us finish the rest of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 145, line 18, after the word "bailiff," to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800"; in line 19, before the words "at $1,400 each," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in the same line, before the words "at $1,200 each," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; and in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$56,480" and insert "$56,980," so as to make the clause read:

Court of Claims: Chief justice, $6,500; 4 judges, at $6,000 each; chief clerk, $3,500; assistant clerk, $2,500; bailiff, $1,800; clerks—1 at $1,600, 3 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each; stenographer, $1,200; chief messenger, $1,000; 3 firemen; 3 watchmen; elevator conductor, $720; 2 assistant messengers; 2 laborers; 2 charwomen; in all, $56,980.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 146, line 2, after the word "court," to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$8,000," so as to make the clause read:

For auditors and additional stenographers, when deemed necessary, in the Court of Claims, and for a stenographer, at $1,600, for the chief justice, to be disbursed under the direction of the court, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 148, to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That in the event of reductions being made in any force employed under the civil service or in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine whose record is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary. Any person knowingly violating the provisions of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator withhold it for a moment until I make an inquiry about the matter?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I see that this section 5 covers all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines. Under that section, I suppose, whether a person had ever seen any service or not, he would come under this rule.

Mr. WARREN. If he had made record service and had been honorably discharged. If the Senator will permit me, in the last bill, when we were arranging civil-service changes, providing for an efficiency board, we incorporated in that provision a similar clause to this in relation to the District of Columbia, and that is the only place where that particular provision prevails—that no honorably discharged soldier who has a good record shall be dropped. This carries those outside the District and puts them on the same footing.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I rise to make a point of order against section 5, on page 148. It is legislation not properly upon an appropriation bill. Senators who are not present in the Chamber have a right to rely upon the integrity of the rules of the Senate that new legislation shall not go on appropriation bills. I do not think it a wise practice to have this done, and I make a point of order against the section for that reason.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator will withhold the point of order until the Senator from Ohio can be heard.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Ohio proposes to offer an amendment to this section, which would not in any way obviate the point of order. I will yield, of course.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to stating the amendment which I propose to offer. The Senator from Idaho, by his question, evidently had in mind just what I had in mind at the time of the preparation of this proposed amendment.

Under this section, as it appears, no honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine could be dropped from the service.

Mr. GALLINGER. If he has a good record.

Mr. POMERENE. I can understand why there should be some favor given to a soldier who has seen actual service either during the Civil War or during the War with Spain, but if it is some soldier who enlisted and has been in camp for three or four years, and should later be discharged from that service honorably and get under the civil service, and he is to be preferred to other men who are engaged under the civil service, I do not think we should extend that privilege that length.

Mr WARREN. I have only to say, Mr. President, that this was inserted here with the idea that it was only fair to treat those outside of Washington as we treated those within the District. I should not object, if the point of order was withdrawn, to such an amendment as the Senator proposes, and perhaps indicated by the Senator from Idaho; but the only intention of the committee was to have the same privilege given to those who might be on the register or be employed by the United States outside the District as those inside the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that the Senator from Oklahoma has withdrawn the point of order, but if he did I renew it. I am opposed to any such special privilege anywhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Oklahoma yielded to the Senator from Ohio to make a suggestion after the point of order was raised, and he did not withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to state that I am opposed to any such privilege being given anywhere. Believing that it is improper here in the District, I am opposed to enlarging it to places outside of the District. I have never heretofore pressed that view, because so large a number of those who are deriving the benefit were soldiers of the Civil War, and I have always been willing to yield somewhat my general convictions in their interest, but now the Spanish-American War is included; all soldiers are included. I think that service in the Army and in the Navy also ought to be treated as a distinct proposition, and we ought not to burden our general service with men who are not entirely competent or keep them because they have done something somewhere else. I think the departments and all the public service are entitled to men of the highest efficiency, and they should remain in office on account of their efficiency, and for that reason only.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the point of order which was made is insisted upon, I suppose that those of us who are in favor of this proposition are helpless, but I call attention to the fact that we had exactly the same provision in the legislative appropriation act which passed less than a year ago. However, it is in the shape of a proviso to a section which deals only with the District of Columbia. My understanding is that it was the belief at that time that this proviso would apply to all parts of the country and to all persons employed in the executive departments. The provision is found in section 4 of the legislative appropriation act at page 413 of the last session laws. That section provides that—

The Civil Service Commission shall, subject to the approval of the President, establish a system of efficiency ratings for the classified service in the several executive departments in the District of Columbia—

And so on. Then follows the proviso:

Provided, That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary.

So the language of that proviso is identical with the suggested amendment that is now under discussion. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] says to me that there is something added, but on page 414 the law continues:

That any person violating section 4, etc., shall be summarily removed from office, and may also, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine—

And so on. It is the same thing.

Mr. President, as I said, I understand it was the understanding in putting this proviso in that it should apply to all the executive departments of the Government and to soldiers and sailors and marines wherever employed in those executive departments. But because it is in the form of a proviso the well-known rule of construction steps in, which is that a proviso is a mere limitation upon the main section of which it is a proviso, and therefore it can not have the wide scope it would have as an independent provision of law.

This amendment simply seeks to put in the law what it was the intention to put into the law in the legislative appropriation act of last year.

I very much hope the Senator from Oklahoma will see his way clear not to insist upon the point of order.

The Senator from Georgia has said that we ought not to make classes of this kind, but it has been the policy of the Government from the very beginning to make classifications of this very description. We are acting upon similar provisions all the time. Our laws provide that the ex-soldier shall be preferred in appointments under the civil service. This simply carries the proposition one step further and prevents an ex-soldier who has been appointed from being discharged. But the Government is amply protected, because the provision is that he shall be rated good in the department. If he has fallen below the standard, then, of course, he is amenable to the provisions of law which would authorize his dismissal.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. Under the rule it is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose a soldier of the Spanish-American War had an $1,800 clerkship and was rated good, and lower down in the same service there is a clerk at $1,200 who is rated very good. There is a clerk, then, receiving a good deal less pay and doing a good deal better service, and simply because the $1,800 clerk had been in the Spanish-American War proficiency is not the test of his payment but something else is. That will be the practical effect of this rule. It is demoralizing to the effort to bring up the standard of proficiency.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me to answer, the practical effect would be that the $1,200 clerk would not be prevented from being advanced if his record justified it, but the ex-soldier clerk who is receiving $1,800 would not be demoted if his record was good.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the appropriation bill fixes the number of $1,800 clerks, the number of $1,600 clerks, and $1,400 clerks, and $1,200 clerks, and he stands there at $1,800 without another $1,800 clerkship open, to the exclusion of the more proficient clerk in the same line or perhaps in the same office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does exactly what I said. It will not interfere with the promotion if there is a place.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If there is a place it will not interfere with the clerks of lower grade, but it will prevent the demotion of a clerk who occupies a place in that grade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He occupies the place to the exclusion of one who is rendering better service to the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It will prevent his being supplanted by a clerk occupying a lower place, if the ex-soldier is rated good. Personally I am in favor of that sort of legislation. I am in favor of the provisions of law which are now upon the statute books, which permit a discrimination in favor of the ex-soldier.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I will inquire, if debate is in order, upon the merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not; and the Chair has stated that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, under the rules, debate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in the hands of the Chair to permit debate or not, as the Chair sees fit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the point of order made by the Senator from Oklahoma is well taken and that the amendment is not in order. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 148, after line 9, to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That section 8 of the District of Columbia appropriation act, approved June 26, 1912, shall not take effect or be operative during the fiscal year 1914 except to the extent that it prohibits the payment of membership fees or dues in societies or associations: Provided, That during the fiscal year 1914 expenses of attendance of officers or employees of the Government at any meeting or convention of members of any society or association shall be incurred only on the written authority and direction of the heads of executive departments or other Government establishments or the government of the District of Columbia; and a detailed statement of all such expenses incurred from June 30 until December 1, 1913, shall be submitted to Congress on or before January 1, 1914.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply wish to inquire what that language means. To one not acquainted with its purposes it is not clear.

Mr. WARREN. It will take but a moment to explain it. In the closing hours of the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill last year there was a section inserted which was intended to remedy an acknowledged evil, that too much money was expended for the employees of different departments in traveling to meetings of associations, and so forth. It was, of course, supposed to be in the interest of the Government, but the conditions were made so drastic that the board of health, the Surgeon General, and others were prohibited from entering into any of these meetings or obtaining the benefit of the associations. So every department, I think, without exception, appealed to us, and in one bill and another—in the Agricultural appropriation bill and the others—in the last session we attempted to fix it.

When we got through the different bills they represented different privileges to different departments. So the committee on the House side put a provision like this one in the sundry civil bill. It was about the last measure enacted, and they put in this general provision, which would not only serve to remedy the evil, but would yet leave elasticity enough so that on the written order of a head of a department they could go to certain of these association meetings. But they are debarred from paying club or association fees, and so on.

It is merely continuing what was in the sundry civil appropriation act last year and is now current law.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I feel constrained to make a point of order against this item. It is general legislation and changes existing law. I do not think it ought to go on the appropriation bill. I am very sorry not to be able to agree to it, but I do not think it should go on this appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. It does not change existing law. It simply continues law as everything in this appropriation bill does. It is word for word a continuation of the present law for the next fiscal year.

Mr. OWEN. It expressly changes existing law in its own language, that section 8 shall not take effect, and so on.

Mr. WARREN. But section 8 was repealed last year in the bill and this simply extends it the same as an appropriation of money would be extended.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to make only one observation about this matter. The original provision was on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, placed there against my judgment, and I think it was altogether too sweeping. It has worked a detriment to the service of the Government. It was put there under a misapprehension. As a matter of fact, it was intended to cure a small evil and it brought great harm.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The same interest that insisted upon putting it in, later assented to this proposition and was glad to have it go in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the last bill corresponding to this one this provision was inserted. I think it was unfortunate that the word "hereafter" had not been put in the provision, because then it would have made it law. This is simply a continuation of the law that we enacted in the last legislative appropriation act.

While it is general legislation, I do hope the Senator from Oklahoma will withdraw his point of order. It affects the health service and many other departments of the Government, that really ought to be permitted to send a representative to a convention where he is expected to learn very much for the welfare of the people of the country.

Of course if the issue is to be made that no general legislation is to be permitted on appropriation bills, I think there will be some harm done in the future, because there are times, we have all learned, when it is the only way we can legislate to cure something that needs immediate attention. A bill can be introduced for this purpose, and possibly we might get it through Congress in one, two, or three years, but in the meantime harm is being done to the public good.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I only wanted to emphasize upon the attention of the Senate the fact that appropriation bills shall not be made the vehicle for legislation. I realize that this provision has some value, and I do not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right in his contention in a general way. I thank the Senator for withdrawing the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have no interest in this whatever, except an interest in the good of the service, and, as the Senator knows, it would not have gone into effect until the 1st of July, when the Senator's party will be in charge. I agree with him that legislation ought not be put in appropriation bills. In this case it was merely to cure a fault of earlier legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the Senate to return to the amendment on page 144.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment on page 144 will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 144, after line 11, the Committee on Appropriations reported to insert:

Commerce Court: For the Commerce Court, from March 5 to June 30, 1913, both dates inclusive, namely: Clerk, at the rate of $4,000 per annum; deputy clerk, at the rate of $2,500 per annum; marshal, at the rate of $3,000 per annum; deputy marshal, at the rate of $2,500 per annum; for rent of necessary quarters in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and furnishing same for the Commerce Court; for books, periodicals, stationery, printing, and binding; for pay of bailiffs and all other necessary employees at the seat of government and elsewhere, not otherwise specifically provided for, and for such other miscellaneous expenses as may be approved by the presiding judge, $16,111.11; in all, $19,977.78, to be immediately available.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, it was the understanding, I think, of practically every Member of the House and Senate and the understanding with the country at large that after the series of events regarding appropriations for the Commerce Court transpired last year the Commerce Court would, in effect, go out of business on March 4.

Now, this is an effort—and we might as well understand it—to rejuvenate and give new life to the Commerce Court, which, as I said, everyone supposed was going out of business on the 4th day of March, with the close of the present administration. The present appropriation included here calls for about $20,000 to carry it on to the 1st day of July. The original amendment, as reported by the subcommittee, not only carried it to the 1st of July, but appropriated for the full year of 1914. That went out in committee.

If the pending amendment is adopted it merely means another continuation of the lease of life of the Commerce Court. If it is not adopted it means that on the 4th day of March the Commerce Court comes to an end for lack of an appropriation.

The argument was made in committee, and it will be made here on the floor of the Senate, that we should appropriate for the Commerce Court up to the 1st day of July in order to allow it to wind up its business properly. I doubt whether that argument can be really sustained. I doubt seriously whether that is the purpose of the present amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. DIXON. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will we not have exactly the same trouble on the question after next July? Was not the limitation of this appropriation to March 4 notice that in so far as they could wind up their business it should be wound up by the 4th of March? Can they not wind it up by that time just as quickly as in July?

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Georgia states the case very well. On the 1st day of July there would again be renewed a proposition for another appropriation. Now, the way to resume is to resume, and the way to abolish this Commerce Court is to strike this amendment from the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Montana allow me just a moment in reply to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DIXON. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. The talk in conference at the time, when it was found necessary to leave all legislation out, was that there would be legislation in the meantime, between the 1st of December and March 4, whereby the business would be provided for in other courts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Permit me to say further, on the part of the committee, that the subcommittee which prepared the bill for the full committee entertained, I think, the same opinion that the committee and the Senate entertain, that the duty of the Appropriations Committee is to provide for what is ordered under the law.

This court was in existence with business before it, and we had failed meantime to provide any way whereby the business could go to other courts, as I understand it.

Now, a litigant, a shipper, who has a difference with a transportation company and goes to the Interstate Commerce Commission and wins his case, unless we do something to relieve him, is almost at the mercy of the corporation. They appeal the case, and there we are.

That is why the subcommittee presented an appropriation to the full committee for the fiscal year of 1914 and for the four months remaining unprovided for in the present fiscal year; and it ought not to go out, because we have failed to provide any other way for the continuance of the Commerce Court business.

One word more. I have in my hand here the hearings which the Senate committee had. It took pains to try to hear from all interested parties. It heard from shippers and also had before it the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, Messrs. Prouty and Clements, and also had the leading solicitor and attorney of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In my opinion, those are the persons of all others who might object to the court. They all stated, and the attorneys most emphatically, that chaos would follow unless we provided some way for handling appeals, with the necessary and appropriate legislation, so that the business of the public would not be obstructed and shippers would not be completely at the mercy of transportation corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me just a moment?

Mr. DIXON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] at the last session of Congress, with the assistance of a few other Senators, perfected a plan by which the business before the Commerce Court was to be handled, and provided broadly for the distribution of the cases and the continuation in the courts of the country other than the Commerce Court—the district and circuit courts—of the business of the Commerce Court. We sent that from the Senate as the action of the Senate, and it was yielded in conferen .

Now, with very little difficulty, that amendment then perfected by the Senator from Iowa can be put into a separate bill, or, if the point of order is not made upon it, we can place it as an amendment on this appropriation bill. We can take care, with no difficulty, of the shippers who are concerned about the trial of their cases. We can easily provide for that, and the way to make sure that we will provide for it is to stop this appropriation. Then everybody will help us provide for it.

Mr. DIXON. As the Senator from Georgia remarked awhile ago, the continuation of the life of the Commerce Court by this appropriation until the 1st day of July will merely result in piling up more cases in the Commerce Court, whose jurisdiction must be redistributed to the Federal courts in different districts. I will be perfectly happy if the Senator will offer the amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offered to the appropriation bill at the last session as a modus operandi of redistributing the jurisdiction of the cases already on file, but I reiterate this is merely allowing the camel's nose to get a little farther into the tent. It makes it more difficult all the time to abolish the court. The temper of the country is to abolish it. The record of the Commerce Court certainly has not reflected glory on itself, and the quicker it is abolished the happier the people of the country are going to be.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask this question: I take it for granted that, should there be an accumulation, the same legislation that would take ten cases would take a hundred if you should legislate and transfer the business to another court?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that I do not like to attack a bill from a committee of which I am a member, but I made this same fight in the committee. I did succeed there in striking out the appropriation for 1914.

I would be very happy to have the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offer in lieu of this amendment the amendment which he offered to the appropriation bill last summer, providing a schedule for the transfer of the cases, and then on the 4th of March the thing will have been finally accomplished.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my opposition to the Commerce Court began when it was originally proposed, and I have never ceased to be opposed to the existence of the court. But until the court is abolished and its jurisdiction is conferred upon some other court we ought to maintain the court. It would be an intolerable situation to preserve the jurisdiction of the court and refuse to give the court the means by which it could exercise its jurisdiction. No other court has the jurisdiction which is now conferred upon the Commerce Court. We must not, as it seems to me, allow a period from the 1st of March until the 1st of July to intervene in which the people of the country will have no opportunity to resort to the courts in those cases of which the Commerce Court now has jurisdiction. That seems to me to be fundamental.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I will conclude what I was about to say, and I fancy I will advance the thought in the mind of the Senator from Kansas in conclusion. The reason I have not offered to this bill the amendment which I offered to the bill of similar character of last session is that the bill, having passed Congress, went to the President for his approval. He disapproved the bill on the ground, among other things, that Congress had abolished the Commerce Court. His disapproval did not in any wise change my mind with regard to the matter, and I stand ready at any time to vote either for an amendment or an independent bill which abolishes the court and bestows its jurisdiction elsewhere. But we have the same President we had then, and I assume he has not changed his mind.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I assume that the President would veto the bill as he did before, and that all we could do upon the return of the bill to us would be to surrender, as we did before, and pass the bill without the amendment. It has, therefore, seemed to me a rather foolish, or, at least, a futile, thing to do.

I now yield to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who, I think, asked me first to yield, if the Senator from Montana will allow me.

Mr. DIXON. I merely want to suggest, in connection with what the Senator has said, while we have the same President that we had when he vetoed the last bill, the President has, in the interim since he vetoed the last bill, heard from the country at large and, in consideration of what has happened, may have a different view of his own at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that the verdict of the country at large was a verdict upon that particular issue.

Mr. DIXON. I want to further suggest to the Senator from Iowa that this amendment, if it is necessary, can go on a half dozen appropriation bills which will come up between now and the 4th of March. Why not strike it from this bill, and in the meantime prepare the amendment which the Senator from Iowa offered last summer to be offered in connection with any supplementary appropriation bill on the sundry civil bill or on the deficiency bill or on half a dozen other appropriation bills which are coming up?

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Montana really think that the President of the United States will approve an appropriation bill which abolishes the Commerce Court?

Mr. DIXON. I am not in the confidence of the President of the United States. There is plenty of time between now and the 4th of March—to which time an appropriation has already been provided for—for the Senator from Iowa to offer his schedule for redistributing the jurisdiction of cases now pending and to pass the bill through the Senate during the life of the present appropriation bill. I think, in view of the fact that this can very easily be done on any appropriation bill between now and the 4th of March, it is worth while to try it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I now yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. What I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Iowa was that there seems to be no effort being made to provide for the assignment of the jurisdiction to other courts which this court has had.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have sent for a copy of the amendment prepared by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which was adopted by the Senate at the last session of Congress. I hope to have it in a few moments, and I think I shall offer it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, I certainly shall vote for an amendment of that character, although I intend presently to take a resolution not to vote for any general legislation upon appropriation bills; but I have not yet taken it, and may defer it until the coming in of the next administration.

Mr. BRISTOW. What I wanted to further suggest was that we have here an appropriation continuing this court until the expiration of this fiscal year. If this amendment is defeated, the country will then be exactly in the same condition in which it will be on the 4th of March. This does no good; it simply postpones for three months the "chaos" we have been hearing about.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. This bill, to be logical, ought to make an appropriation for the fiscal year 1914.

Mr. BRISTOW. And if this goes through, I predict that that appropriation will find its way into some other bill continuing the court beyond the 1st of July. For one, I am very much in favor of an amendment to this bill, in lieu of this one, distributing the jurisdiction and directing this court to go out of business on the 4th of March.

Mr. CUMMINS. I also am very much in favor of such an amendment, but I have not believed, having met the experience of a disapproval of a similar bill, that it was worth while to attempt the abolition of the court without a majority of two-thirds in Congress under present circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. BRISTOW, and Mr. FOSTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. FOSTER. I wished to ask a question, as I thought the Senator from Iowa had yielded the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I voted for this provision in committee for the reason that I thought we would be in bad shape if we did not insert it in the bill. I am quite willing at any time to vote for the abolition of the Commerce Court. I believe that that is coming, and perhaps it had as well come at one time as another; but Mr. Farrell, who is the solicitor of the Interstate Commerce Commission—and I believe there is not any too kindly a feeling between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commerce Court—gave testimony which influenced me very much. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to read a couple of paragraphs from his testimony?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Farrell said:

> Mr. FARRELL. Unless the Commerce Court is abolished or its appropriation continued a chaotic condition will ensue after March 4; and I have no hesitancy in saying that the Congress should either appropriate further for the Commerce Court or else abolish it and transfer its jurisdiction to other courts, so that they may operate on those cases after March 4.
> Senator FOSTER. Mr. Farrell, you said that, in your opinion, conditions would be chaotic as to the cases pending and cases to be brought unless there were additional legislation. Will you please explain a little more fully what you mean by the condition of those cases being chaotic?
> Mr. FARRELL. I mean that the Commerce Court would still have its jurisdiction, but no practical way of exercising that jurisdiction; that it would have no money with which to do business, and still would have business to do.
> The CHAIRMAN. And the right of appeal from your commission would exist with no legal way of putting it into effect.
> Mr. FARRELL. That is correct.
> Senator FOSTER. The court still exists, and the jurisdiction of the court still exists, and there is no machinery to carry on the cases and enforce either the power or the jurisdiction of the court.
> Mr. FARRELL. Yes.

Then Mr. Needham, in giving testimony, practically repeated the same language that Mr. Farrell had used.

While, as I have said, I am quite ready at any time to vote for the abolition of the Commerce Court, if provision is made to transfer its jurisdiction to other courts, it occurs to me that we ought not to do it offhand to-day and leave cases hanging in the air, whereby litigants would be denied their rights for some time to come. That is the attitude I held in committee, and I think it is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. I take much the same position; but I think, so long as the court exists, that we ought to maintain it. Our first step should be to abolish the court and transfer its jurisdiction, which is a highly necessary jurisdiction, to some other tribunal. Then, of course, the appropriation becomes unnecessary; but to leave the court in existence without the possibility of discharging its functions would be to impose a very great hardship upon the people of this country. I do not think the Senate would intentionally or consciously leave that void in the judicial system of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I now yield the floor, having said all that I desire to say.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, as a member of the Appropriations Committee I think it but just and proper that the Senate should understand the reasons that prompted at least a majority of the members of that committee in submitting this amendment.

In 1909 or 1910 the Commerce Court was created, and exclusive original jurisdiction was conferred upon that court for the trial of all cases wherein the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission were involved. The jurisdiction which had theretofore extended to and been exercised by the circuit courts of the country was withdrawn and exclusive original jurisdiction was given to the Commerce Court for the purpose of trying all those cases. In the act creating this court there were also provisions made for certain officers, setting out the number of the officers and the salaries that should be paid to those officers. At the last session of Congress, after the bill carrying with it an abolition of the court had been vetoed—I think, upon that ground the veto was based—there was a compromise effected in the conference committee, by which an appropriation was made for rent, stationery, and the payment of the officials of that court until the 4th of March. As we found the law in the committee, it was that the Commerce Court as a court still existed; that it enjoyed the identical jurisdiction which was conferred upon it in the act creating it; but that from the 4th of March until the end of the fiscal year there was no appropriation made for carrying on and operating the machinery of that court.

So, Mr. President, the law has left the court in existence and it has left it with its jurisdiction, but it has left it without any means of carrying on the court, because of the failure to appropriate for a building in which the court was to hold its sessions, for clerks to file the papers of the court, or for marshals to execute the orders of the court or to give notices. In that situation it seemed to me at least that it was necessary and that it was the duty of this committee to report an appropriaion in order to make available the money necessary to carry on that court from March until July. In fact, I favor an appropriation for the whole year. That did not involve, nor am I going to discuss, the question of the desirability of the abolition of the court. I did not believe that it was a proper method of legislating to carry into general appropriation bills general legislation. That has always been my position.

I believe, further, Mr. President, that the President would do just what he has heretofore done if this provision had been put in the bill.

Unless this amendment shall be adopted, what will be the result? You will have the Commerce Court as a court, you will have it with its jurisdiction, and you will have all the cases now pending before that court and the cases hereafter to be brought returnable to that court without any machinery at all to operate the court. It will completely tie up all of the interstate commerce litigation.

When this matter was up for consideration by the committee there appeared before the committee two lawyers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Both of those lawyers have had large experience in the conduct of these cases. One of them was Mr. Farrell. I asked him before the committee:

Senator FOSTER. Of course, as you understand, this is an appropriation bill. The bill fails to make any appropriation for rent of building or purchase of stationery or the payment of any of the officials of the court. As I understand the bill, it does not abolish the Commerce Court, but it practically stops the operation of the machinery of the court. Now, if the bill passes in its present form, failing to make these appropriations, what will become of the cases now pending in that court and of the cases hereafter to be filed by any litigant?

Mr. Farrell's answer was:

Unless the Commerce Court is abolished or its appropriation continued, a chaotic condition will ensue after March 4; and I have no hesitancy in saying that the Congress should either appropriate further for the Commerce Court or else abolish it and transfer its jurisdiction to other courts, so that they may operate on those cases after March 4.

Then I asked Mr. Needham, who seems to have had a very extended experience in Commerce Court litigation, this question:

Senator FOSTER. We might ask Mr. Needham if he agrees with Mr. Farrell as to the chaos that would follow in the event that there were no other legislation than that which refuses to make any appropriation for the support and maintenance of the Commerce Court?

Mr. NEEDHAM. Oh, yes; that would be a deplorable condition.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course there must be either legislation or appropriation.

Mr. NEEDHAM. There would be no way of disposing of applications for restraining orders, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. Your cases would simply be hung up in the air, and both shippers and transportation companies would be in limbo.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Oh, yes; it would be a condition of chaos.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator if this awful condition which we are about to confront can not be remedied by providing for the distribution of the jurisdiction of this court to other courts? Congress has very emphatically taken a position in regard to the continuance of this court. Now, instead of trying to force its continuance by presenting to the Senate and the country this chaotic condition that will exist if the appropriation is not made, why not offer some remedy for it and let the court go out of existence, as it is clearly and manifestly the intention of Congress that it shall?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator. Of course, the Appropriations Committee had nothing to do with the legislation in regard to the Commerce Court and, in my opinion, ought not to have anything to do with it. If there is a bill passed abolishing the Commerce Court, that bill necessarily carries with it the abolition of all the officers under the court, and all appropriations for those officers will cease, because there will be no officers in existence to receive the appropriations.

These are the reasons, Mr. President, that impelled me to vote in committee for this amendment. As I have stated, general legislation of the character that was put on this bill last year, I believe, is against the better policy of legislation; and so far as I am concerned, I shall object to it being placed upon this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have cooperated for several sessions with that contingent in the Congress of the United States which sought to abolish the Commerce Court, and my service was that of an ally rather than a veteran.

So far as the court itself is concerned, it is a distinct improvement of the judicial system of the United States. It supplies a real want and will facilitate, as nothing else will facilitate, the administration of the interstate-commerce law so far as it relates to transportation. Anybody who is at all familiar with the history of one of these rate cases in a United States district court will understand at once that the delay in itself amounts almost to a denial of justice. That has been the experience in all the Western States; it has been the experience in Arkansas, and we have there just as industrious, just as competent, and just as able a judge as any of the district judges in this country. The defect is in the system and not due to any particular deficiency in the judge.

The subject of transportation in its relation to interstate commerce has grown to such an extent that it has become of itself an independent topic of sufficient proportions to justify a special tribunal to deal with it. In the contracts of merchants time is of the essence; and in the matter of transportation it is of the utmost importance to know just exactly what the law is, because it enters into commerce in all of its branches. The railroads have had no better friend than the procrastination that has been imposed upon litigation in this country by the congested condition of the dockets of the courts.

The Commerce Court was an experiment when it was tried; that is to say, the public demand was crudely responded to. I voted for that feature of the law in opposition to the wishes of some of my associates on this side of the Chamber.

My principal business in life has been in the courthouse, and, whilst I did not distinguish myself there very greatly, I have learned some things by observation, more particularly relating to lawsuits conducted by other and abler lawyers. One of the things I did learn is that promptness in the disposition of litigation is quite as important as correct decision in the end.

We are just in the infancy of interstate commerce. Every time the Supreme Court of the United States meets it lays down some novel, almost startling, doctrine. The business of transportation is nation-wide. The technicalities connected with it are such as to perplex those who devote their lives to attempting to unravel them. A special class of lawyers has been raised up in the profession to take charge of the litigation of that kind which has grown up. So special or technical is it in its character that lawyers familiar with the ordinary rules of law that would serve them in general practice are not deemed to be competent to take charge of such controversies.

I think that demand has extended beyond the bar, and has now become a necessity, so far as the court itself is concerned. The subjects of the enforcement of the rights of shippers and the protection of the rights of the public have become separate subjects of the law. It is a distinct achievement in the direction of a better condition to have to deal with these questions a court instructed in all of the rules and matters and all the peculiar practical features of railroad construction and railroad operation. There grows up there much more quickly than it can in the different district courts of the country a body of laws peculiarly applicable to controversies of that kind. A special court grows familiar with such controversies; it can act quicker; its decisions are rendered quicker; and cases are finally disposed of quicker. All those things contribute to the efficiency of government and reduce the expense and uncertainty of controversies such as these. They prevent many controversies which otherwise would be precipitated by the public-service corporations, whose activities are subject to the jurisdiction of that court, because they know now that the time usually devoted to business of that kind has been very greatly shortened; and where they know they are not right, they are not likely to contend.

I have voted to abolish the court and the judges of it. My objection, however, was to the character of judges who were put there. I was utterly disappointed when the President announced the list of judges whom he had selected to constitute the membership of that court. He had been looked upon as possessing peculiar qualifications for selecting, from among the body of lawyers, judges who were qualified to discharge the duties that would be imposed upon them; but he has made the impression upon me, and I feel safe in saying that he has made the impression upon others, that if there is one particular service in which he has proven to be a signal failure, it has been in that behalf; and you do not have to go outside of the membership of that court to condemn him as being utterly incapable of rising above the peculiar group of circumstances, not at all to his discredit, when he comes to make nominations for places of that importance.

The character of judges that he placed there discredited the court before the country. The very first thing they did was to constitute themselves the censors of the Interstate Commerce Commission. They took it upon themselves to review de novo every order that had been made, not limiting their jurisdiction to laying down principles of law and accepting the findings of fact of that tribunal; but one of the members of the court who was taken from that commission sought to make his dissenting opinions as a commissioner the rule of the law of transportation of this country.

True, the Supreme Court has set them right in some of its opinions. It may be that the definition of jurisdiction contained in the amendment to the interstate-commerce act is not as accurate as it should be; but improvements along that line, with a different class of judges, would, in my opinion, remove whatever dissatisfaction there exists in connection with the Commerce Court.

I am not disposed here to undertake to cripple the court now. The court, as I have said, does not stand well, not because of the structure of the court or the constitution of the court, but rather because of the judges who were appointed to administer that particular feature of the judicial function. In the first place, they discredited themselves in the extravagance with which they fitted up their court room. That was exhibited here on this floor. No such recklessness has been displayed by any public officials who have had charge of the disbursement of money for purposes of that kind. They showed a weakness and a vanity about it that was certain to impress one with the thought that they felt themselves to be a little different from what the law intended they should be. Then their habitual raids upon the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission were such as to create the impression that that tribunal had been abolished, except as a place where controversies could be originated, and that the real hearing and disposition was to take place in the Commerce Court.

I have my own notions about that kind of a court. I believe there should be a central court, composed of the very best judges who can be found on this continent, who should be paid a salary that will secure them. Whenever we have that kind of a court, they will vindicate the wisdom of the establishment of such a court by demonstrating to the country that no other means that can be adopted involving no greater expense than that can be inaugurated with such gratifying results.

The proposition now pending is to allow sufficient money to keep the court running until July. I believe I shall lend the aid of my vote to that proposition. I believe that before many months roll around, certainly before many years roll around, we will have an opportunity to deal with the court in a broader way, and it is possible that some means can be found by which the just criticisms of the country may be obviated and the usefulness of the court may be increased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIVELY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 144 of the bill.

Mr. DIXON. I understood that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was going to offer as an amendment——

Mr. LODGE. The question will be divided anyway.

Mr. DIXON. I understood the Senator from Georgia was going to offer as an amendment the schedule prepared and adopted at the last session of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] would make the point of order against the amendment, and it clearly is out of order to put this proposed legislation on an appropriation bill. So I abandoned the idea of presenting the point of order. I think the proposition should be submitted to the Senate as a separate question.

Mr. DIXON. I should think that the Senator from Georgia would offer the amendment and allow the responsibility to rest on the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] for redistributing the cases now pending before the Commerce Court——

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the Senator does not think the Senator from Louisiana is going to hesitate to take the responsibility.

Mr. DIXON. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, when I heard the statement of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] I knew it was so, and I think the only remedy would be to kill this appropriation and introduce an independent bill. If we divide this appropriation an independent bill will certainly pass both Houses.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think this item should be stricken out of the bill. The Congress of the United States has heretofore expressed its desire that the Commerce Court should go out of existence. The President of the United States has used his veto power to prevent the will of Congress becoming effective. Therefore the Congress of the United States has the right, under the practice of government, to refuse supplies, in this connection, as a means of making good its protest against this court. Congress is entirely justified in this, in my judgment, and the refusal of the supplies necessary to carry on this court will make necessary the abolition of the jurisdiction of this court, the distribution of the cases before the court, and provision for dealing with cases which are on appeal from this court. That can be done in due order, but I think this item should be struck out, and I wish to say as much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to suggest that the question is not on a motion to strike out. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it has to be put affirmatively.

Mr. DIXON. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion will be put affirmatively upon agreeing to the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question. The question is, Shall the committee amendment be agreed to?

Mr. OWEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Ashurst	Crawford	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Bacon	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Cummins	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Dillingham	Owen	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Dixon	Page	Smoot

Clapp	Jones	Pomerene	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Root
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Sanders
Crane	Lodge	Shively

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I was not here during the discussion of this item, and I do not know whether any attention has been called to the form of the amendment offered by the committee. I notice at the close of the amendment the amount appropriated in all is $19,977.78; but it appears from a tabulation of the items preceding that that the amount it provides for is a great deal more than that. The separate items, added together, amount to the sum of $31,977, apparently. As I say, I was not here during the previous discussion, and this matter may have been explained.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator is mistaken about his figures. It provides for these expenses at certain rates per annum, but only for the remainder of March after the 4th of March, and April, May, and June; in other words, it covers the contingent expenses and salaries of the employees from March 4 to June 30.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This paragraph, as I understand, does not specify the amount appropriated, but leaves it to be determined by a mathematical calculation.

Mr. WARREN. It is at the rate of so much per annum.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does not state how much.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it does. I beg the Senator's pardon, but if he will have it read he will see that it does.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It states how much per annum, but it does not state the amount of the appropriation for salaries.

Mr. WARREN. This is upon the basis of the current law, except they cut down in rent, and the basis on which the appropriation asked is the number of days in which the court would be provided for at the rates of salary established by law, and at a lower rate of rental, which is made as low as possible. Of course, the old appropriation for traveling expenses is left out entirely. But the amount is as stated, a little short of $20,000—$19,977.17.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is nothing in the amendment proposed by the committee from which it can be determined how much of this money is to be expended for rent, how much for furniture, and how much for any other incidental expenses.

I notice in a statement which I have in my hand among some of the incidental expenses of this court, pasteboard fitting pipes and drapery, $150; slip covers for 55 window draperies and 7 court screens, $145; 13 mahogany and silk-lined window shades, $122; altering 5 judge's court-room chairs, original cost $945; 72 feet mahogany bookcases, $1,404; 1 leather davenport, $175; models for carved work, $160; 5 judge's court-room chairs, $600; 3 plate-glass tops for desks, $57; and 7 leather pillows, $77.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if he can state what portion of this item of $16,111, specified in the last item in the amendment, is available for expenses of the kind I have just mentioned.

Mr. WARREN. The first appropriation for this court was on a basis of $100,000 for the first year. For the current bill or the present fiscal year was a trifle over $62,000.

The proposed sum for four months to complete the present fiscal year is on the basis of the $62,000 a year, and amounts to a little less than $20,000 for the four months. This amount covers every expenditure of every character of the Commerce Court, excepting, of course, the salaries of the judges themselves.

Mr. DIXON. That would be $16,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would take some little time, and I am not going to undertake to make the calculation the Senator refers to. My understanding has been that ordinarily in appropriation bills the amounts appropriated for the items specified are stated in the bill. Of course, it would make no difference what explanation the Senator from Wyoming would give or what were the intentions of the Senate in appropriating this amount. The law on the face of it leaves absolute discretion in the Commerce Court to spend the entire $16,000 for leather pillows, or mahogany bookcases, or altering judge's chairs, or plate-glass tops for desks.

I desire to call attention to the absolute lack of any limitation in this amendment of the proportion of the sum appropriated which may be used for incidental expenses. There is no specification of the portion of this sum which is to be spent for rent; and if we are to judge by the practice of the court heretofore in expending money, I would suggest that if the appropriation is going to be made at all it ought to be limited to the purposes for which Congress intends it to be used.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not strengthen his case by repeating it. There is no such latitude as the Senator states. This specifically provides that a certain amount, which it is easy to calculate if a man will take a pencil and a piece of paper, is to be spent within a certain length of time and for a certain purpose.

The difference between the salaries at the rate per annum stated for the length of time stated, which, as I have already said, amount to over $12,000 of this sum, and the total appropriation under this paragraph would be the amount available for the items referred to.

Mr. GALLINGER. The total amount is $19,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the entire sum.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator from Washington will pardon me, the amount for salaries is less than $4,000. The $12,000 is for the entire year. You are appropriating for the period only from March to June. The amount that you are appropriating for salaries is the difference between $16,111.11 and $19,977.78. There is absolutely $16,000 that can be expended there on the certification of the presiding judge without any regard to the question whether it is for leather sofa pillows or mahogany bookcases or plate-glass tops or what not.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand that this, in addition to rent, is to cover the cost of books and periodicals, pay of bailiffs, and so on, at the seat of government. These items are, of course, in the estimate, and if it is desired to make the point that each one should be specifically stated, it makes the case different from our appropriations for other courts. But that can be done.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this appropriation is for the support of the court, which the Senate, at its last session, after thorough debate and a full discussion of the record of the court, and the relations of the court with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the revolution which the court had worked in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the interference with the functions of that commission, had abolished to all intents and purposes. It seems to me it is not a particularly edifying spectacle before the country when the Senate, after great deliberation and thorough debate, has decided a matter of this kind, that we should reverse that action at the succeeding session of Congress. I am not aware of anything that has occurred in the meantime that renders this court more acceptable now than it was then, nothing that has occurred that has in any way indicated that the court is disposed to change its attitude toward the Interstate Commerce Commission, or in the construction and abuse of powers which the court has or claims to have under the law under which it was organized.

The same reasons that applied then apply now. So far as I am concerned, I expect to vote the same way now that I voted then, and it seems to me that the Senate, unless there is some reason proposed, ought to refuse to reverse the action which it took at the last session.

The Supreme Court of the United States has declared in one of its decisions, which has already been cited, that the action of the Commerce Court—the rules undertaken to be laid down by the Commerce Court—had the effect of revolutionizing the law under which the Interstate Commerce Commission was exercising its functions. Before this court was created the Interstate Commerce Commission was regarded as an administrative body, acting under a rule or policy laid down by Congress, and its administrative acts were final; its findings as to facts, except where there was an excess of jurisdiction, were final. But this court, set up as a supervisory power, or setting itself up as a supervisory power, as to the findings of fact made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, has rendered the Interstate Commerce Commission practically useless.

These things were all discussed at the last session, and it would be useless, and I do not propose to go into them now. I simply want to register an objection, as far as I am concerned, for one, to a reconsideration of the question, when there is no reason advanced for a reconsideration of it.

The experiences which we have had with other courts that undertake to set themselves up above the law has not tended in any way to support the position taken by the Commerce Court. Very recently in the State of Idaho the supreme court of that State took a position very analogous to that which has been taken by the Commerce Court in regard to its functions, and laid down the rule that the Legislature of the State of Idaho had no power to limit punishment for contempt of court; that the court was supreme; that the court was above the legislature; that it had some inherent power derived from some mysterious source, which it did not explain, which was not subject to regulation by the legislature. It undertook to imprison publishers of a newspaper for a period of time double the limitation fixed by the legislature of the State as a penalty for contempt, and expressly declared that the legislature had no right to limit the power of the court. That, to all intents and purposes, is the attitude that has been taken by this Commerce Court.

It is a superfluous body. It is not needed, even though it had subjected itself to the law that has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States. But it has not done that. It has assumed an authority which the law does not give it, and has announced the same doctrine in the performance of its functions, in the issuance of temporary injunctions to restrain orders made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which the Supreme Court of Idaho announced in this contempt case, namely, that it had certain inherent powers above the people, acting through the legislature, which had undertaken to define the limit of its power.

The expenses of this court amount to almost $100,000 a year, taking into account those matters which are not included in the items specified in this bill. The money has been expended extravagantly and recklessly, and if this amendment passes it will leave absolutely in the discretion of the court, as has been already stated, an opportunity to continue the extravagant expenditure of this large amount of money for purposes which are utterly unnecessary and improper.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the manner in which this amendment comes up makes it a little difficult and embarrassing to one who is opposed to the Commerce Court and at the same time would like to see its existence terminated in an orderly way. I was opposed to the creation of the Commerce Court and I am opposed to its continued existence. I hesitate, however, to vote against appropriating the money necessary to run the court so long as it is in existence.

If I were not of the opinion that the act would be followed, if successful, by some means or method of disposing of the cases and transferring them in an orderly way and in disposing of the court, I should not vote against this appropriation. But it seems to me that if we are successful in cutting off the appropriation it will be followed in an orderly way with an act which will dispense with the court and transfer its jurisdiction to other courts.

For that reason, while it is somewhat of an incongruous position for one to occupy who is in favor of appropriating money whenever a court is in existence, I propose to cast my vote against the appropriation. I am so thoroughly opposed to the court that I can not give my consent to anything which would seem to favor its continuance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, on page 144 of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRANE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I think that Senator is not in the Chamber. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and vote "yea."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I desire to announce that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], as has been announced by that Senator.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I observe that he is not in the Chamber. I transfer that pair to my colleague, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], thereby permitting the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and myself to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. He is necessarily absent on account of sickness. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY. May I inquire whether the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with that Senator. On account of his absence I decline to vote. Were he here I would vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], and he being absent I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent from the Senate on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 20, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On page 26, after line 6, I move to insert:

For legislative reference bureau, under the direction of the Librarian of Congress, $10,000.

Mr. WARREN. I make a point of order against the amendment. It is not estimated for and is not recommended by any committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OWEN. I think the point of order is well made. I offered the amendment, however, because it is a matter of great importance to the future usefulness of the Senate and the House of Representatives to begin the establishment of a reference bureau from which a Senator or Representative may obtain authoritative information on legislative questions. It has been established in Wisconsin and has proved very useful there. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will not insist upon his point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will withdraw his ruling if the Senator from Wyoming desires to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not feel that I ought to withdraw the point of order, because, in the first place, there is no law or estimate for it, and it has not had the consideration of the committee. I think it should have the consideration of the committee, which the committee has not been able to give it. I therefore insist on the point of order.

Mr. OWEN. I remind the Senator that it passed the Senate a year ago, if I am not mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made by the Senator from Wyoming is sustained.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to present an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Under the head of "Legislative," insert:

That the salary of all employees of the United States Senate who are receiving less than $1,800 are hereby increased 25 per cent. In no case, however, shall the salary so increased exceed $1,800.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. My purpose, Mr. President, in offering the amendment is that we may reach those of lower grade. I feel that it is manifestly fair. It is a universally admitted fact that the cost of living has increased from 40 to 60 per cent, and these salaries have not been increased in years. I feel that it is a matter of simple justice.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, early in the consideration of the bill the manager of the bill felt that those who were not satisfied with the committee's action upon these Senate positions ought to have the opportunity to settle it here on the floor of the Senate. Therefore, all similar amendments are for the Senate itself to settle.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think this is an inopportune time for increasing salaries, and we should not increase a salary until we know that there is a special reason for so doing. The same reason which prompted me to object to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia prompts me to raise the point of order against this amendment. It may be that increases will hereafter be made. It may be that an equalization of salaries will take place. I raise the point of order that this item has not been estimated for and is not otherwise within our rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order is made by the Senator from Arkansas. The Chair must sustain the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. That completes the bill, so far as committee amendments are concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether the amendment known as section 5 was adopted? I was called from the Chamber for a few minutes this afternoon.

Mr. WARREN. Section 5 was stricken out on a point of order made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and sustained by the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. The whole of section 5?

Mr. WARREN. The whole of section 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to make one further statement. I stated this afternoon that before the disposition of the bill I intended to offer an amendment relating to the Naval Observatory, the American Ephemeris, and the Nautical Almanac. I have concluded not to do so, but I shall offer a resolution presently for an investigation of that subject by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to give notice that immediately after the conclusion of the omnibus claims bill, which is in charge of the Senator from South Dakota, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider House bill 22871, to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with the agricultural colleges of the several States.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I could not hear the first part of the statement of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Immediately after action by the Senate upon the omnibus claims bill, which is under the Senator's direction, I shall then ask the Senate to take up the agricultural extension bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am very glad the Senator is making that exception, but from the speed which I have been making with the omnibus claims bill I think it is a little discouraging to both the bill which I am trying to get action on and the bill in which the Senator from Georgia is interested.

Mr. LODGE. The regular order.

Mr. WARREN. What has become of the appropriation bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the claims bill was to follow the appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. The appropriation bill has not yet been passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I understood that the Senator from South Dakota intended to ask the Senate to take up his bill immediately after the appropriation bill is passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. On page 16, in line 15, I move to amend by striking out "$2,500" and inserting "$3,000" after the word "clerk."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 15, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. And in the same line, as a part of the same amendment, after the words "assistant clerk," I move to strike out "$1,600" and insert "$2,000"; and after the word "janitor," in the same line, to strike out "$720" and insert "$1,000."

I will say to the chairman of the committee that they are the salaries of the clerks of the Judiciary Committee of the House, and I have a letter from the chairman of the House committee asking that these amendments be made. I have a letter here from Mr. FITZGERALD, and also from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to see the letter of the chairman?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What is the necessity for it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say that it has been the uniform custom to let each House fix the expenses of its own employees.

Mr. WARREN. I wish only to have the letters read; and, if the Senator will permit me here, I desire to say that there is a comity between the Senate and the House committees. The Senate has never, to my knowledge, proposed an amendment, or those in charge of appropriation bills consented to an amendment, to strictly House of Representatives matters, such as salaries, except where there came a written request from the other House. There seems to be a request at the present time from the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations to have this done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if this amendment was made to the bill in the other House or whether the House has acted on it at all?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was not made there. Through inadvertence attention was not called to it. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the House feels that his clerks are not sufficiently paid, but through inadvertence the matter was not taken up in the House at all, and he now asks that it be put on in the Senate and be permitted to go to conference. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, Mr. FITZGERALD, writes a letter making a request that these increases be made, so that the matter may go to conference and have the consideration of the House.

Mr. WARREN. Let the letters go into the RECORD.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the letters be read.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is the amount which is already in the bill the amount which those officials have been receiving during a considerable period in the past?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suppose so; though the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the House feels that his clerks are not paid salaries commensurate with the salaries paid to the clerks of committees of like dignity and with equal responsibility and work, and the thinks their salaries ought to be increased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the letters be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letters referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 13, 1913.

To the COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIRS: I should like to see the salaries of the clerks and the janitor of the House Committee on the Judiciary made commensurate with the duties performed by them. The bill was reported to the House before I took this matter up, and I am therefore addressing your committee on the subject.

The clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House now receives $2,500. I think this salary ought to be increased to $3,000. The assistant clerk now receives $1,600; I think this salary ought to be raised to $2,000. The janitor now receives $720; I believe his salary ought to be increased to $1,000.

During the last session of Congress the Committee on the Judiciary was in session, on the average, every day of the session of Congress, and sat, on the average, two and a half hours for each session of the committee. The clerks were kept at the rooms of the committee in the discharge of their duties until late into the night more often than not. The work of the clerical force has greatly increased since the salaries were fixed at their present figures.

Respectfully, yours,

H. D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1913.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: The Committee on Judiciary of the House desires to have some changes made in the legislative, etc., bill with reference to its clerical force. After consulting with the House managers who will have it in charge I have to request that you will make such changes as Mr. CLAYTON requests, so that the matter may be taken up in conference.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it will be observed that the chairman of the House committee asks that this amendment be made here and that the matter go to conference. I hope that the Senate will follow that course. I feel sure that the chairman of the committee on the House side will in conference or House session bring the matter up in a way that will settle it to the general satisfaction of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, it seems to me that this practice is not one that is to be commended. The House of Representatives never will have an opportunity of passing upon the matter of fixing the salaries of some of its own subordinate employees. This is a request, addressed by two individual Members of the House, to an individual Member of the Senate. If they had communicated it to the Senate in an official way, bringing to the notice of this body the fact that an omission had been made through inadvertence, I think the rule would be a safe one, but I do not favor it as a general practice. I am not prepared to say how far I am willing to go on this occasion in having matters of that kind disposed of on such a basis.

The salaries named are in excess of the salaries paid generally in Congress to clerks of committees; they are higher than the salaries paid at this end of the Capitol.

Mr. LODGE and others. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It seems so to me. Are there any clerks here who receive as much as a salary of $3,000?

Mr. LODGE. The clerk of the Committee on Appropriations receives a salary of $4,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is higher than the salary received by anyone around the office of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do. The Senator from Kansas always says something worth while.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand this is $500 more than the clerk of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate receives.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is what I had particular reference to.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, if the Senator will permit me, the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, as I recall, has two employees—certainly one employee—more than has the Judiciary Committee of the House, and I think two. I will look it up in a moment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If it is a rule, I do not care to change it; if it is a practice based on comity, I do not care to change it; but I do say that it will set a precedent that will soon be followed in this Chamber when applications are made for the increase of somebody's salary because a similar salary is being paid for similar service elsewhere.

Mr. LODGE. I think this rests on the long practice of the Senate, and a right practice, that each House should fix absolutely the salaries of its own employees throughout, and that the other House should not interfere with them. I think that has been our universal practice, and I think it will be a great misfortune if we do not comply with the wishes of the House. What they choose to pay their clerks, it seems to me, is no business of ours.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts how does he think we ought to find out what the House wishes to pay—by letters written in this way or by what they actually do?

Mr. LODGE. This is a suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who is responsible for the bill and will be one of the conferees. This amendment, if adopted in conference, will go back to the House, and can not be adopted without the approval of the House.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. For the approval of the entire report on the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. This item can not, then, be singled out for a vote.

Mr. LODGE. They can single out any item they wish and have a vote on it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Not on the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. Excuse me; it is perfectly possible to select——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The conference report must be adopted as an entirety.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; but it can not be amended.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is our rule.

Mr. LODGE. It can not be amended, but any item can be selected to be acted on.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What is the use of voting on it if you can not amend it? That would be a naked right.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me a moment——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think I understand that the object of having a vote is to do something that you want to do.

Mr. LODGE. The practice of the House differs from that of the Senate. They are in the habit of instructing their conferees on specific items of bills, and. if they choose to instruct on this item and refuse to assent to the Senate amendment, it is wholly in their power to do so.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understand that is so before it goes to conference; but when the conference report is made it is acted upon as an entirety; it must be adopted as an entirety or rejected as an entirety. There is no such thing as taking out an item of a conference report.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will remember that we are constantly accepting portions of conference reports in the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a partial report.

Mr. LODGE. It is a conference report to go back to the House.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes; that is in the case of partial reports from conference committees.

Mr. LODGE. We do not have the practice of selecting items, but it is wholly within the power of the House to do so; and it is within the power of the Senate to do so if it chooses.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. A great many things are in the power of the House to do if attention is ever called to them. What I object to is that this matter may go in the bill as amendment numbered so and so, and the House may never know what it is.

Mr. LODGE. The motion in the House would be to instruct the conferees.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On a $2,500 clerkship?

Mr. LODGE. In any event, I think it is their business.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as a matter of comity between the two Houses, each House has been permitted since I have been a Member of the Senate to determine the compensation of its own officers and employees.

Mr. CULLOM. That has always been the practice.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not know whether or not the compensation asked for in this case is reasonable. I am not in a position, nor are other Members of the Senate in a position, to judge of the labor performed by these clerks and the responsibility imposed upon them, but the chairman of the House committee who, as we all know, was engaged in the impeachment trial, overlooked presenting this matter to the House committee when it had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and in the last few hours he wrote the letter which has been read. I read it very hastily. I did not know to whom it was addressed, and supposed it was addressed to me, because it was handed to me on the floor by a Member of the House of Representatives. The chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations also had a conversation with me, and there has also been read his letter asking the Senate to put this bill in such a shape that the House can consider these increases of salary. I think it is in accordance with sound usage that we should adopt this amendment requested of us in this way, so that the House may determine what compensation it will pay to its own employees.

When this matter was presented to the committee by me the chairman of the committee stated that the action desired was in accordance with the uniform custom of his committee, but that he would not favor the adoption of the amendment increasing these salaries unless he had a written request to that effect from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the other House, as well as from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of that body. Both have written such letters; and according to the custom of the Senate, and in view of the comity between the two bodies, I think the amendment ought to be adopted, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the House had increased these salaries and the bill had come here containing such increases, of course I would not be disposed to oppose them, although I do not think they would be justified; but if these increases are made, it is fair to presume that the conferees on the part of the House will agree to them, because a member of the House Appropriations Committee, who will be on the conference committee, has requested that this amendment be incorporated in this bill, and the conference report——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that was stated, I think, inadvertently. The chairman of the committee, who has written the letter, will probably not be one of the conferees unless they change the program in appointing conference committees. The members of the subcommittee—Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina and Mr. BURLESON—would probably be the conferees from the House representing the majority.

Mr. BRISTOW. I had supposed the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would be one of the conferees.

Mr. WARREN. Not on this particular bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. I may be mistaken about that; but, in any event, when the conference report is agreed upon it will be reported to both Houses, and the House will not have an opportunity to express its desires as to these specific salaries. The only way the House can get at it is to reject the conference report; and it certainly would be an unreasonable proposition to insist upon the rejection of a bill carrying something over $30,000,000 because an increase of $500 had been made in the salary of a clerk. The adoption of this amendment by the Senate will put the House in a position where they can not take the sense of the House upon this particular amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I know the Senator wants to be right, and, of course, I have no more interest in this than he has; but, as a matter of fact, the rules of the House provide that no bill shall go to conference except by unanimous consent unless it is referred first to a committee.

In the case of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, last year when the bill went back to the House certain matters were passed on. For instance, an amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio as to the Pension Office clerks was taken up on motion of Mr. CANNON and settled before the bill went to conference. Then there were two or three other matters. Almost anything in this bill, under the House rules, can be taken up and be passed on by the House before the bill goes to conference; and it can only go to conference by unanimous consent when it goes over there without first going back to the committee, as I understand the House rules and practices.

Mr. BRISTOW. The chairman of the committee, of course, is very much better acquainted with the details of the House procedure than I am. I was judging from our own rules here.

I want to say, further, that if these employees of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House have earned more than their salary because of extra work that has been imposed upon them as a result of the impeachment trial, then there should be an appropriation made to pay them an additional amount for that additional work; but it seems to me that to increase the salaries of committee clerks and employees away beyond the amount paid other committee clerks and employees in either body for the same services in this way is a very dangerous thing to do, and I intend to vote against it. It is proposed to pay $1,000 to a janitor. We do not pay that anywhere.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I have no question whatever but that probably the salary of the clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House should be $3,000. I would be glad if it were made that; but it occurs to me that the record in this case will show that if this amendment is adopted the Senate is fixing the salary of the employees of the House. The House sending the bill to the Senate has fixed the salary of the clerk of the Judiciary Committee at $2,500. It may have been through inadvertence, as undoubtedly it was; but notwithstanding that, the fact is that as this bill came here passed by the House it fixed the salary of its own employee at $2,500.

Mr. LODGE. Two thousand.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; $2,500. It appears in the Senate in that way. We have accompanying that a letter from the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee saying that, in his opinion, the salary ought to be $3,000. We also have a letter from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House saying that, so far as he is concerned, it ought to be $3,000; but we have the action of the House itself in passing on the bill as having fixed it at $2,500. Now, does not the Senate put itself in the position, if this amendment is agreed to, of saying to the House of Representatives, "We do not take your view as to what the salary of the committee clerks ought to be, but we take the view of the Senate, fortified by the view of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and also of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee"? It occurs to me that, no matter how worthy this appropriation might be, we are putting ourselves in a strange position by seeking to remedy an oversight of the House in this particular way. If the House is in favor of this, I suppose a supplemental bill can be passed fixing the salary of the clerk at $3,000. I am only throwing out this as a suggestion, because I am convinced from what has been said that the salary of the clerk of that committee ought to be $3,000. I am merely suggesting it in the light of the conditions and the circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think we ought not to hesitate about this matter. The truth is that in the case of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, which presumably has not more help than is needed, the salary list amounts to more than twice that of the same committee of the House; and, while I hesitate to call attention to any committee, for instance, the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico of the Senate has a salary list larger than that of the Judiciary Committee of the House.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice of the Senate pays more in salaries than is paid to the employees of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House. I do not mean to allude to any particular committee in any disagreeable way. The House in framing this bill have not interfered with our list of employees; they have been very generous; but it seems to me if we haggle over this matter the House may take a hand in saying that the Senate has more employees than it ought to have and make trouble for us in our appropriation bills.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Are we not, in taking the action proposed, interfering with the action of the House as to their employees?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not, inasmuch as the request has come from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. I think courtesy demands that we should accede to the request, and I do not think it is interfering at all——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is just the point, Mr. President, with which I had difficulty—that we were interfering with the action of the House. That is what I want to avoid.

Mr. GALLINGER. That does not trouble me at all. I think it is a matter of courtesy that we ought to accede to and not discuss it very much, because if we get into a wrangle between the two Houses as to the matter of the salaries that are paid our employees, I confess I think the Senate would get the worst of it. That is my judgment; and I should like to have this passed over as quietly as possible and let the request be acceded to, and I do not think we will ever hear from it again.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I wanted to say in regard to the comparisons which the Senator from New Hampshire has been making, that I do not think they are fair, because the clerical allowance for a Senator is more than that for a Member of the House, and it ought to be, because his constituents embrace the entire State, and he has correspondence with the constituency of every Member of the House from his State. I do not think the comparisons made are at all pertinent to this question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, this looks queer to me. Here is a Senate Committee on the Judiciary. All judicial appointments come before the Senate for confirmation. They are referred to that committee. It certainly has as much work to do as the House committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. And we have a clerk. We pay him $2,500 a year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let me finish this.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Very well.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The House pays $2,500 to its clerk, and it passed an appropriation bill with provision for paying him, as usual, and then it comes over here in this very strange way at the last minute, just after we have refused to give to our own employees in the Senate any increase, after we have refused to consider a proposition made here with relation to our own employees; and when the House has failed to provide for this man, passed the bill without doing it, it comes in here is this peculiar way and asks us to increase the salary of one of its clerks. It is a small matter, but it seems to me a very peculiar proceeding.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it seems to me this debate illustrates just the reason for the comity which has heretofore existed between the Houses. We can not pass on the needs or the requirements of their committees or of their employees. We can not do it properly or intelligently, and we are not the guardian of the House. They have the power to look after their own expenses, and I should resent very much any attempt on the part of the House to say what we should pay our employees.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to ask the Senator if the House of Representatives has asked for this?

Mr. LODGE. In my judgment, that point, if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the other House are to be called in question as representing the House, does not appeal to me. I think they are responsible to the House for what they do. Their request is published here; everybody in the House will read it to-morrow. If they do not represent the House and the House objects to what they are doing, then it is for the House to deal with them. But I do not think it is for us to question their responsibility.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, we know the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House and a considerable number of the members of that committee have been here during the entire session attending upon the trial of the Archbald impeachment. They undoubtedly have been very much engrossed in performing their duties as managers, and it is quite natural that they should have overlooked a matter of this kind, and as long as we are told that it is a matter of inadvertence I do not care about standing on details of punctilio about it. I think we ought to accede to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not as familiar with the rules as possibly I ought to be, but I think this amendment is contrary to the rules of the Senate, and I make the point of order against it that it increases the appropriation already contained in the bill, and that it has not been moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of any department, and therefore it is inadmissible under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Iowa withhold for a moment? There has been some talk here as to the Senate controlling exclusively its own employees and their salaries. I was taught early in my work here that the Senate should control its employees and their salaries, and the House should control its employees and their salaries.

It will be remembered that last year we had a quite large addition—the Senator from Iowa was one of a subcommittee that reported to the full committee on this side—we had in the bill a great many new Senate places. The point was made by the House that we had added too many and that they had a right—that is, the conferees—to have a say about the employees of the Senate. We contested the matter nearly three weeks in conference, the Senate conferees maintaining that they had the right to control the Senate employees, and that right was finally conceded by the House conferees.

Now, the Senator is right that the correct place to have fixed this item was in the House, but as it is to go into conference, in which the House would be represented, and as it has to go to the House first, they can cut it out if they want to. I very much fear that to change the rule or practice of comity between the House and the Senate may place in jeopardy some amendments of the Senate the retention of which may be deemed desirable.

I have felt that in conference the conferees would not allow higher salaries there than here, probably, and it would be adjusted so that each House could maintain its respective position.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not believe that the House will recognize this infraction of the rule of courtesy, which permits each House to fix the salaries of its own employees. We have the House bill before us and this is not a proposition to reduce the salary.

If a mistake has been made, and one seems to have been made, the method that is suggested is not, in my opinion, the proper way to correct it, and therefore I insist upon my point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa makes the point of order that this amendment is out of order under Rule XVI. The Chair submits that point to the judgment of the Senate. Senators who think it is in order will say "aye," and those that think it is not in order will say "no." [Putting the question.] The "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I call for a division.

Mr. CUMMINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARREN. Just call for a division.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CUMMINS. As we are to construe a rule of the Senate, I want it done with a proper sense of responsibility.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask that the question be stated, so that we may know just what we are voting on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the amendment in order? Those who say that it is in order will say "yea" and those opposed will say "nay."

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote on account of my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is absent.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE]. I vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence from the Chamber of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 14, not voting 63, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Catron	Lodge	Perky	Warren
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Root	Wetmore
Foster	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Jones	Penrose	Thornton

NAYS—14.

Ashurst	Burton	Poindexter	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote discloses no quorum.

Mr. WARREN. I give notice that I will ask to take up this bill for completion, if it is the pleasure of the Senate, immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, at the conclusion of the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the omnibus claims bill.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes post meridian) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 16, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who knowest the beginning and the end, and who boldest in Thy grasp the destiny of men, prepare us with fortitude to meet whatever may come to us this day, in joy or sorrow, victory or defeat, and give to us the courage and the strength to do our duty as it is given us to see it. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INCREASE OF JAPANESE IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, as to the question whether or not the Japanese are increasing in California, or liable to increase, contrary to a statement that is being circulated, I desire to have the Clerk read an article in the San Francisco Chronicle, of January 8, 1913.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ONE BRIDE IN EVERY SEVEN IS JAPANESE.

SACRAMENTO, January 7.

One-seventh of all the marriages in San Francisco are between Japanese subjects, according to George Leslie, statistician of the State board of health. During the year 1912 San Francisco had 6,102 marriages, and of this number 867 brides were of Japanese nativity, or 14.2 per cent. For 1911 the proportion of Japanese brides was only about one-tenth, the total number of brides being 5,226, of which 553, or 10.6 per cent, were from the Flowery Kingdom. Many of the Japanese brides are said to be recently arrived "picture brides," who are married American fashion.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time.

LANDS IN STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATION, SOUTH AND NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 109, an act authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of North Dakota and South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, and to agree to a conference asked by the Senate on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 109) to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. FERRIS, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] rises to a question of personal privilege. The gentleman will state his question.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not make a practice of asking the House to listen to a question of personal privilege connected with some newspaper remark or report. I do not think a man can afford to do that. But there is an investigation going on now before the House Committee on the District of Columbia with reference to the valuation in part of a building in the city of Washington known as the Southern Building. Witnesses are being examined under oath before that committee, and on the 30th day of December last, I believe it was, there was a witness before that committee, Mr. Charles C. Glover. After making a statement as to everything that was pertinent to the investigation then being made, on page 420, as published, Mr. Glover said:

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Glover, do you desire to make any other statement?

Mr. GLOVER. I would like you to indulge me for a moment in connection with a matter that has had some inquiry made in connection with the value of the property known as Massachusetts Avenue Heights. I would like to state very briefly my connection with that property.

In 1906, desiring to bring the Potomac Park and the Rock Creek Park together—that is, assuming that the Zoological Park is a part of Rock Creek Park—I got an option on 100 acres of this property for the sum of $420,000. In 1907 I caused to be introduced into the Senate and House a bill looking to the purchase of this property at the option named, but with $3,000 added by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for expenses that might be incurred in acquiring it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who introduced those measures?

Mr. GLOVER. A Member of the House and a Member of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you recall whom?

Mr. GLOVER. I do not at the present moment. I am not sure that the commissioners did not ask for the introduction of this bill. I took the bill to the then Commissioners of the District of Columbia and they thoroughly approved of the scheme.

My option was for two years, and for two sessions of Congress this property was offered at the price named—$420,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. How was the property described? Was there any particular name for it?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; it was the property lying between Connecticut Avenue and Massachusetts Avenue Bridges, and ran out to the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation. There were also 3½ acres south of the Massachusetts Avenue Bridge. It was my intention to continue down Rock Creek until these parks were finally joined. As the panic had created a very extremely critical and serious condition in the money market——

Mr. JOHNSON. Which panic?

Mr. GLOVER. The panic of 1907, which ran well into 1908 and 1909. I endeavored to have this option renewed for another year, having failed within the two years to cause the passage of this bill. After much difficulty I succeeded in having it continued for another year, in writing. A short time ago somebody told me that I had better get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 1909, of March 3; that I would probably find therein the cause of what I have been told has frequently occurred—a defense of my character by my friends before members of the House committees. Mr. Judson has told me that frequently he has had to defend me.

Mr. JOHNSON. In this committee?

Mr. GLOVER. In this committee, no; other committees of the House, and dating three years back.

I read this record for the first time about a week ago, and I find, Mr. Chairman, this statement by Mr. ANDRUS, of New York.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the date of that?

Mr. GLOVER. March 3, 1909; and I am reading from page 3877 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There is a good deal more of it, but I just want to read this statement, because it bears directly on what I have to say:

"Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS]. [Applause.]

"Mr. ANDRUS. Mr. Speaker, the work of a session of Congress apparently is never completed until we have some little discussion in regard to an appropriation for the purchase of land in Rock Creek Park. My time is rather limited, but at the outset I want to state how I stand on parks. I am in favor of parks, as I am in favor of public schools, in favor of churches; churches to grow a better moral influence in the community, schools so that the children may acquire an education, and parks where the children can play and grow bone and muscle and nerve to help them bear the heavy burdens of life that will follow. I would like to give you just a hasty résumé of this matter for four years. On March 27, 1906, Senate bill 5289 called for $600,000. On the 27th of March a Senator wrote to the president of the District Commissioners asking certain information, and among the information asked for I find this.

"I read from his report. It is calendar No. 2811, near the bottom of the third page:

"'The price named in the bill, $600,000, for about 437,000 square feet of land, or about $1.37 a square foot, is in excess of the estimated value of the land by the board of assessors, their value being $230,000.'

"Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience, having bought a few lots during my life, and I found the assessor's value, as a rule, a pretty good criterion on which to act. On March 30, 1906, evidently a conscience was pricked, and a bill, H. R. 5102, was introduced for $550,000—$50,000 less. On February 16, 1907, conferees of the House and the Senate came to an agreement of $475,000, but it was not satisfactory to the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the matter was dropped with the expiration of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

"The thing took on new life, and on January 27, 1908, the bill S. 4441—which I have here—was reported for $423,000, a gradual coming down. That bill went directly to one of the appropriation committees, and on May 26 last, under a suspension of the rules, it was defeated by a vote of 57 for and 164 against.

"Mr. NORRIS. That was this same bill?

"Mr. ANDRUS. This same bill that is brought up to-day. Now, what have the Government and the people lost in these three years? We are talking now about $423,000 as against $600,000 three years ago, a saving to some one of $177,000. The interest on $600,000 for three years at 2 per cent is $36,000. It makes a total of $213,000. It may be a small sum in this House, but, Mr. Chairman, there are 10,000 boys in my district who would be exceedingly happy if in a legitimate way they could make that money in three years. [Applause.]"

I want to now read what Mr. SIMS, of Tennessee, has to say on the same subject:

"Mr. NORRIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. SIMS.

"Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, when this identical bill, without the change of a letter, was voted on by yeas and nays in this House on the 26th day of May last, 164 noes were recorded as against 57 ayes. How many gentlemen are going to change, and what reason are you going to give for your flop in so short a time? Now, there will be a yea-and-nay vote at this time on this bill, and you will have to explain some day why you changed in so short a time, without any new evidence or any new reason given for the change. There is no option on this land at this time. I will read from a statement made by Mr. Charles Glover in the hearing before the Committee on Appropriations last year, before this bill was voted on in May last.

"'The CHAIRMAN. How is it, Mr. Glover, with respect to the 88 or 98 acres; would it be possible for you to have the option renewed another year?

"'Mr. GLOVER. No, sir; that is out of the question, Mr. Tawney. They have assessed this ground at $7,500 an acre. The assessment has gone up tremendously.

"'Mr. FITZGERALD. The assessed valuation of it?

"'Mr. GLOVER. Yes; they have put it up enormously, and justly so. It is a pretty fine piece of ground. Bell told me the other day that they hardly knew what to do about this thing.

"'The CHAIRMAN. You think it would be impossible to renew the option?

"'Mr. GLOVER. Absolutely.

"'The CHAIRMAN. When will the option expire?

"'Now listen——

"'Mr. GLOVER. With this session of Congress.'"

I succeeded, after many conferences and much difficulty, and owing to the fact that the panic had made it almost impossible to borrow on that character of real estate, in securing an option for another year. This is the debate at the end of that last year that this property was offered to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SIMS continued as follows:

"That was the last session Mr. Glover said this option expired. When has it been renewed? If he told the truth then, and I do not question his veracity, there is no option on that land at this time. I was told by as good a Member as there is in this House that another Member, who is a Member now, is interested in one of the syndicates mentioned by Mr. Glover, in one of these pieces of land. Are you going to be influenced into enacting such legislation as this under suspension of the rules?

"Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

"Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

"Mr. CLAYTON. Do you think it is fair to the membership of this House to make that statement without naming the man or at least giving the authority?

"Mr. SIMS. The gentleman who told me is in his seat on the floor of the House at this moment, and he can tell the name of the Member if he so desires.

"Mr. CLAYTON. On which side of the Chamber?

"Mr. SIMS. On the other side of the Chamber.

"Mr. CLAYTON. What is the color of his hair?

"Mr. SIMS. Oh, his hair is all right.

"Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that if the gentleman has any information upon that subject he ought to name the man.

"Mr. SIMS. The gentleman who told me is present, and he will tell you that a Member of this House is now or was, interested in one of these pieces of land, and has used his personal influence heretofore to pass this bill.

"Mr. CLAYTON. I insist that the gentleman from Tennessee ought to give the name of the Member from whom he obtained that information.

"Mr. SIMS. Oh, he is now in the Chamber.

"Mr. CLAYTON. I want to hear all the information and I insist that he furnish the name. Give us the name.

"Mr. SIMS. The gentleman who told me is on the floor of the House; he can give it.

"Mr. CLAYTON. Name him.

"Mr. SIMS. I will not name him. He is here and hears what I say. Will giving the name tend to prove anything except this: That whenever people in this District have land they can not sell to anybody else they try to sell it to the Government before it goes up? They started in on this tract at $600,000 and now they have got it down to $435,000. Of course, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BURTON, and the other gentlemen who have spoken in behalf of this bill, did not know that any Member of the House was interested in any of this land."

Mr. Chairman, the statement that I offered that property to the Congress of the United States at $600,000; that I was pricked by conscience and reduced the sum to $550,000; that it was embodied in any bill by my authority at $475,000, or, as Mr. SIMS says, it is now before this House at $435,000 is an absolute and unqualified falsehood. I never offered the property save at the one single price of $420,000 plus the $3,000 added by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

As that charge stands, I can well understand why Maj. Judson has had to defend my character before some Members of the House. It leaves me, instead of being a public-spirited citizen, a man with an option on a piece of property at $420,000 endeavoring to palm it off on the Government of the United States at $600,000.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that these gentlemen intended to make an untrue statement, but the bill was before them. Here is the identical bill, and the last clause of that bill says that the price of that land was $423,000.

Mr. Speaker, I have examined Webster's Unabridged Dictionary as to the definition of the word "falsehood." True, the dictionary does not set out any distinction between an "absolute and an unqualified falsehood" and any other kind, but Webster says:

A falsehood is a deliberate, intentional assertion of what is known to be untrue; a departure from moral integrity; a lie.

As I say, this is in a sworn statement made before a committee of the House, and it becomes a part of the record of Congress and will remain here for all time.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that any Member of this House who in debate on the floor of the House makes a false statement about what is pertinent to be considered at the time and misleads the Members of the House and causes them to vote otherwise than they would ought to be expelled. No such man has any business in this House.

Now, I do not propose to do anything more than to give the facts. I am aware that Members of the House under the privileges of this House can get up and denounce individuals and make derogatory statements about men, and under the law they can be held responsible for it nowhere else. Consequently, I do not think it is a manifestation of great moral or physical courage to get up here and denounce individuals, when you can not be called to account for it, but I do think that when a Member is assailed in this way, under the solemn form of an oath, that a Member owes it not only to himself, but also to the House, to state the facts, and let the facts themselves constitute the characterization of the man who made it.

Now, this statement was made in connection with a bill that was before the House for a number of years, beginning several years ago, known as the Rock Creek Park addition bill, or a bill seeking to acquire about 100 acres of land in part lying on Rock Creek Valley, between Connecticut Avenue and Massachusetts Avenue, running out more or less at right angles to Rock Creek in the direction of the Cathedral Foundation, or the Cathedral School. That bill never came to any committee of which I was a member, but bills for that purpose had been considered before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and before the Committee on Appropriations. In 1908, however, the Senate passed a bill, Senate bill 4441, pertaining to said lands.

Now, this gentleman, Mr. Charles C. Glover, had an option on the land, as he explained it, by which he could buy it for $420,000, and he added $3,000 to cover any expenses that might be incurred in connection therewith, making $423,000. He claimed to want the Government to own it for park purposes. This project had been examined several times, had been before the House several times, but the bill had never gotten through. By that I do not mean this particular bill, but a bill seeking to acquire this land had been before the House several times, but it never had passed.

This bill (S. 4441) passed the Senate and came to the House and was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee made the following report, report 1681, to accompany Senate bill 4441. The whole report consisted of four lines, and read as follows:

Report to accompany S. 4441.

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred Senate bill 4441, to acquire certain land in the District of Columbia as an addition to Rock Creek Park, having considered the same, report it back herewith and recommend its passage.

There is absolutely not a line in that report to give anyone any information as to the desirability of that purchase, or anything about it. But I am not criticizing the Appropriations Committee about that, because the matter had been before the House so often that the subject was very well understood by Members who had been in the House when bills for the same purpose had formerly been considered, and they knew perfectly well what was referred to.

There was an attempt to pass this same bill at a former session of the House, but it was voted down. To be accurate, I will give the exact figures. I believe the vote was 57 for it and 164 against it.

The bill, of course, remained on the calendar, because that vote was on a motion to suspend the rules. On the 3d of March, 1909, the last day of that Congress, when, as we all know, we have to stay up all night to consider conference reports and matters of that kind, there was a motion made to suspend the rules and pass this bill, and it was debated for 20 minutes on a side. I did not happen to be in this Chamber at the time the motion was made, but came in while it was under discussion, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr NORRIS] having demanded a second. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS], who was a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, had five minutes' time given him, and he made some remarks pertaining to the bill, because it had been before his committee, in which he said what I have already read to the House, and which appears in Mr. Glover's testimony.

I heard the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS], and I was yielded five minutes, in which I discussed the bill as best I could from what I knew of it, and I did say, as appears in the RECORD, that whenever people in this district have land they can not sell to anybody else they try to sell it to the Government before it goes up; that they started in on this tract of land at $600,000, and now they have got down to $435,000; that, of course, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and other gentlemen, who had spoken in behalf of this bill, did not know that any Member of this House was interested in any of this land.

Now, the facts were that the bill was for $423,000. I was quoted in the RECORD as saying $435,000. Now, at nearly the hour of midnight, on the last day of the session, on a motion to suspend the rules, when there was no time to investigate and understand anything, almost anyone was liable to be misled. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS] spoke before I did and read from a report by Senator GALLINGER, made April 23, 1906, to accompany Senate bill 5201, which did give the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia with reference to this tract of land; but as that bill, which this report accompanied, also embraced another tract of land, known as the Meridian Hill tract, the two being together, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS] made the mistake of reading from that part of the Senate report which referred to the Meridian Hill property instead of this Rock Creek Park addition. He read it at the time. He held the report in his hand, and that report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia contained the very language quoted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS], which I heard, and which I believed. Therefore, how could the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS] or myself, either of us have made a false statement, knowing it to be false at the time? The number of the bill was given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS], the number of the report was given by him and read from in my hearing; but the facts are that not a word in that report or in the speech of Mr. ANDRUS or myself ever charged that Mr. Glover had an option on that land at $423,000 and was trying to sell it to the Government at $600,000. I will admit that by Mr. ANDRUS saying it was this identical bill, and reading from the report of the Senate committee made on the same item in a former bill, I did think myself that was what it referred to, not being a member of the committee that had investigated it. But, Mr. Speaker, the report I have just mentioned, by Senator GALLINGER, is as follows:

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report to accompany S. 5201:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5201) to acquire certain land in the District of Columbia as an addition to Rock Creek Park, having considered the same, report thereon with the following amendments:

On page 1, line 14, before the word "which," insert the words "and the location of proposed new streets."

On page 3, line 14, after the word "therefrom," insert the words "along the center of a proposed new street."

On page 3, line 16, after the word "line" where it first occurs, insert the words "following the center line of a proposed new street."

On page 6, line 1, after the word "plan," strike out the words "as 90 feet in width."

On page 6, line 2, after the word "are," strike out the word "not," and after the word "for," in the same line, strike out the words "in said plan" and substitute the word "herein."

Add sections 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 to the bill.

Also amend the title so as to read: "To acquire certain land in the District of Columbia as an addition to Rock Creek Park and in Hall and Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill for a public park."

Two bills, (S. 5201) "To acquire certain land in the District of Columbia as an addition to Rock Creek Park" and (S. 5289) "To acquire certain ground in Hall and Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill for a Government reservation," were submitted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for examination and report, and their replies are hereto appended, as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 27, 1906.

SENATOR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following on Senate bill 5201, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, "To acquire certain land in the District of Columbia as an addition to Rock Creek Park," which you referred to them for report touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

A blue print is inclosed, showing, on a large scale, the pieces and parcels of land proposed to be condemned for the addition to Rock Creek Park, and also a map on a smaller scale showing the relation of the proposed addition to Rock Creek Park and the connection between the two.

Rock Creek Park as now established starts at the District line, extends along both sides of Rock Creek to the Zoological Park, and then south of this latter park in a narrow strip along the east side of Rock Creek to Massachusetts Avenue. South of this point the United States owns a small strip of land about 500 or 600 feet in length, bought for the use of the Washington Aqueduct.

The addition proposed by this bill joins this latter part of the park. It will lie along the west of Rock Creek, and extends up the valley of a small branch running about parallel to Massachusetts Avenue. The valley of this branch is very deep, and the tract of land abutting the creek is well wooded with large and beautiful trees, making it an ideal piece of property for park purposes. The tract proposed to be acquired extends about 4,000 feet along Rock Creek and northwest about 4,000 feet along Massachusetts Avenue, with a width of 500 to 1,000 feet.

The tracts included in the proposed addition have been owned by two or three estates, which up to the present time have not developed the property. Recently, however, in continuation of the rapid development of that section, a large tract of land has been purchased by a syndicate and arrangements are being made to lay off the land into lots and blocks for the purpose of building. This tract includes about 88 acres of the land this bill proposes to purchase for park purposes, and unless the land is acquired by the Government it will undoubtedly be built upon within a short time. All of this section will probably develop rapidly during the next year or two and the value be greatly enhanced.

In determining on the part of these tracts to be used for park purposes, it was endeavored to leave what was most suitable for building purposes and take for park purposes such part as was best adapted to such use. The area of the land proposed for a park is about 100 acres, and the price is about $4,200 per acre, which is considered to be reasonable, in view of all the circumstances. Options are held on it so that it can all be acquired at such figures as to bring it within the amount appropriated in the bill.

It is further provided in the bill that a small piece of property belonging to the United States lying south of Massachusetts Avenue may be exchanged for an equal amount of land lying to the north. The Naval Observatory grounds are located in this vicinity. The original grounds of the observatory contained about 75 acres, irregular in shape. The opening of Massachusetts Avenue and Observatory Circle, in accordance with the authorized system of highway extension, leaves two strips of the original tract—one on the north of Massachusetts Avenue, containing 14 acres, and one on the south side of the avenue, lying in the angle between Massachusetts Avenue and Observatory Circle, containing about seven-tenths of an acre. This latter strip is proposed to be exchanged. It is of little value to the observatory or to the United States on account of being separated from the remainder of the holdings of the observatory by streets, so that it would seem desirable to exchange it, as proposed in the bill, for an equal amount of land that can be used. The 14 acres to the north can be used as part of a park or such other use as the United States may desire.

The bill further provides that a short section of a projected street called Benton Street shall be abandoned as a highway. This is private property, and the provision means simply that the system of street extension is changed to that extent. It can be seen from the small map that this street will be superfluous if the land is acquired for park purposes.

The bill further provides that the landowners surrounding the proposed park shall dedicate 30 feet for a street and establish a building line of 15 feet, and that the United States shall do the same along the park boundary. This will give a street practically 90 feet wide around the park, which is eminently desirable.

In order to more fully carry out the intention, a few minor amendments are necessary to be made in the bill, as follows:

Insert, in line 14, page 1, before the word "which," the words "and the location of proposed new streets."

Insert after the word "therefrom," in line 14, page 3, the following words: "along the center of a proposed new street."

Insert, in line 16, page 3, after the word "line," the following: "following the center line of a proposed new street."

Strike out the words "as 90 feet in width," line 1, page 6, and also the words "not" and "in said plan," in line 2, page 6. Also insert after the word "for," in line 2, page 6, the word "herein."

The commissioners recommend the passage of this bill as being a measure of public benefit. The land is located within easy access of a large population. It is eminently suited to park purposes on account of the hilly character and the magnificent trees, which could not be grown in many years. It is to-day, although private property, used by many persons as a park, and with the rapid increase of population will certainly prove of the greatest value. The commissioners further believe that, if not purchased before being subdivided and developed, its cost would be greatly increased, and, besides, many of the trees will be cut down and the beauty impaired.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

MARCH 30, 1906.

SENATOR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following on Senate bill 5289, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session: "To acquire certain ground in Hall and Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill for a Government reservation," which you referred to them for report touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

A plat is inclosed showing in blue the land proposed to be condemned.

The object of the bill is to acquire for a Government reservation tracts of land aggregating about 10 acres in extent, lying between Euclid Street, Columbia Avenue or Fifteenth Street, W Street or Florida Avenue, and Sixteenth Street extended, in Hall & Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill. The reservation proposed is similar in nature to the small reservations or parks now existing throughout the city of Washington, such as Lincoln Park, Judiciary Square, Garfield Park, Franklin and Lafayette Squares, which reservations add so much to the attractiveness and health of the city. There are no parks of this type north of Florida Avenue and nothing in the shape of public reservations to the south, except some small triangles, nearer than Iowa or Dupont Circle, a mile or more distant, and the nearest large park is the Zoological Park, in the valley of Rock Creek, about three-quarters of a mile away. The land is being rapidly built up as a resident section, and a large section of the subdivisions of Columbia Heights, Mount Pleasant, and Meridian Hill, and, in addition, those living in the portion of the city to the south would make use of this reservation.

An inspection will show the great use of these small parks in the residence sections and will demonstrate their utility, as well as their beauty. This proposed reservation might also be made use of for governmental purposes, such as the construction of buildings, the laying off of gardens, etc. For a small reservation its location is unique. There is no other tract of land in this vicinity which could take its place for such use. It lies along the great boulevard, Sixteenth Street, which connects the White House with Rock Creek Park, and is situated on the crest of the line of hills surrounding the lower valley of the Potomac. All of this crest from North Capitol Street to Rock Creek is now practically built up, so that it is the only space of its kind that remains unimproved.

It has a view over the city and down the valley of the Potomac River, and in the summer is exposed to the southwest breezes prevalent in this section of the country. It extends down the steep slope of a hill from a point between Chapin and Belmont Streets to W Street, and this slope is necessary as a part of the reservation to prevent the construction of houses which would cut off the view and the sweep of the wind. This portion would also give greater diversity in the character of the park. The upper part is flat and well adapted either to the laying out of a garden or the erection of public buildings. To diminish the size of the park would be detrimental to its value as a park.

The price named in the bill—$600,000 for about 437,000 square feet of land, or about $1.37 per square foot—is in excess of the estimate of value of the land by the board of assessors, their value being $230,000. Very little property has changed hands in this immediate vicinity recently, so it is difficult to gauge the value, but from prices paid by the District for the condemnation of Sixteenth Street extended, about five years ago, which amounted to from $1.25 to $1.75 per square foot, and from figures at which it is known some of the owners of the land in this vicinity hold the same, it is not thought that the land could be obtained for less than that named in the bill. In fact, it is due to a large portion of this tract being on the market on account of the settlement of an estate that so low a figure as that proposed in the bill can be obtained. Conditions are improving in that vicinity, and an early increase in the value of the land is anticipated.

The commissioners believe that this is an opportunity to obtain a reservation in the line of those laid out in the original city limits in a locality which is without a park at present and where one is much needed now and will be more needed as this section of the city builds up; that to obtain this reservation will greatly enhance the beauty of the city and its environments and will add greatly to the beauty of the Sixteenth Street Boulevard, and in that way would be of benefit to all the people of the United States, a great number of whom in visting Washington drive on this boulevard; that at the present time the land can be purchased at a more reasonable figure than it can be in a year or two from now; and that there is no other site in the District as suitable for a Government reservation.

The commissioners therefore recommend favorable action on the bill.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

It will be observed that the commissioners recommend the purchase of the properties included in both bills, and for the purpose of simplifying the matter your committee have combined them in one bill, the passage of which is recommended.

Mr. Glover says:

I read this record for the first time about a week ago, and I find, Mr. Chairman, this statement by Mr. ANDRUS of New York.

Now, I want to state that the facts are these about his not knowing anything about it: This debate occurred on the 3d of March, 1909, at night. In the following November, 1909, just before the meeting of the House of Representatives, I was in the city. Some acquaintances of mine were here, and I was showing them the sights. Among others, as I always do, I showed them the Riggs National Bank. It is one of the oldest banks in the city. It is historic, and the building in which it is located is a very fine building. While in there this same gentleman, Charles C. Glover, three years ago last November, spoke to me and said, in substance, that we had made a great mistake in not accepting that piece of property, and he went on to quote from the language that Mr. ANDRUS had used about its being offered at $600,000 and at $550,000, and about my using the words "$435,000." He said himself that that language read by Mr. ANDRUS had reference to the Meridian Hill land and not his—the Rock Creek Park addition—and that Mr. ANDRUS was mistaken. Not having the RECORD before me, I said, "Very likely." I said to him, "I will be glad, Mr. Glover, to correct anything in the RECORD that may have been said to put you in a false light, and anything that you will send to me I will be glad to put in the RECORD."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, who was then chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, was present and heard the very words that I am now telling you, and yet Mr. Glover, under oath, says that he knew nothing about this language, in substance, until a few days before, when his attention was called to it; and I state to you, as a Member of this House, that he talked with me about it three years ago in the presence of Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH in a very pleasant manner.

Now, my opposition to the purchase of this land was that the Government did not need it and that it was under option. He stated, as you will see in the hearings which I have quoted, that he got an option in 1907; that in two years he had difficulty in renewing it; but on account of the panic and the conditions prevailing and the difficulty of borrowing money on such property he got it renewed one more year. I said in the debate that some people having land in the District of Columbia that they could not sell to anybody else tried to unload it on the Government, and when I use the word "Government" I mean the District of Columbia or the Government of the United States, or both.

He offered the land to the Government for $423,000—about $4,000 an acre. He stated himself in the hearing before the Appropriation Committee:

The CHAIRMAN. How is it, Mr. Glover, with respect to the 88 or 98 acres; would it be possible for you to have the option renewed another year?

Mr. GLOVER. No, sir; that is out of the question, Mr. Tawney. They have assessed this ground at $7,500 an acre. The assessment has gone up tremendously.

Now, the assessment is at two-thirds value, and as this was assessed at $7,500 an acre it was worth $11,200 an acre, and he had an option on it and the right to buy it at $423,000. At what he swears was then the value—over $1,100 an acre—he would make nearly, if not quite, a million dollars.

Now, if that language was true, and he says that it was and swears to it, the assessment shows that if he could have exercised his option, paid for it, and could have given the Government more than half of it he would have made a big profit out of the balance.

But he did not exercise that option. He let it go back to those who held the property or the option or contract on it. What has happened since? About a year ago the owners, or those acting for the owners, dedicated to or contributed to the District of Columbia 17½ acres of this land for nothing, to be used for park purposes. What does that prove? Does it not prove what I said—that when a man had land in the District he could not sell to anybody else he tried to unload it on the Government?

Now, I have a map here, and I wish I could hold it up so that you could all see it. The part marked in green is the part deeded to the Government. Here is Rock Creek, and this is the boundary on the westward part of the 84½ acres. Now, they have deeded the part that is marked here in green, lying along Rock Creek, and the green strip the entire length away up to the extreme western line of that land. They have absolutely dedicated it for nothing to the District of Columbia or the Government. Only three years ago they undertook to have Congress buy it at $4,000 an acre. At that rate it would have been worth $70,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Was the grant to which the gentleman refers made with the understanding that a road would be established and improved?

Mr. SIMS. It was given for park purposes, and that is all I know about it. That is what the assessor told me. Now, I want to tell gentlemen of the House what this strip is. It is a gulch, a deep ravine, between precipitous hills. It is a great advantage to have the Government take charge of it and improve it, a great advantage to those owning the adjoining land.

Mr. MONDELL. Is that the gulch up by Sixteenth Street?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; this is between Connecticut Avenue and Massachusetts Avenue. If the land was worth what Mr. Glover said it was before the Appropriations Committee—$11,250 an acre—then they deeded as a gift, dedicated to the Government or the District of Columbia nearly $200,000 worth of real estate, 17½ acres.

So I was right when I said that some people owned land in this District who, when they could not sell it to anybody else, lobbied around this House and the other end of the Capitol to turn it loose on the Government, because that is what has happened as to this identical piece of land.

What else has happened? I have not the slightest disposition to treat Mr. Glover unjustly. I have no quarrel with him. I have no reason to quarrel with him. He had a right to do this thing and to pursue his own course. I have not noticed anything unusual about Mr. Glover except that he appears to be a man of excessive modesty and rarely ever alludes to himself in connection with the discussion of any matters. He takes great credit for the acquisition of Rock Creek Park, acquiring 1,600 acres for about $1,200,000. Under oath he admitted that the land in Rock Creek Park that he takes so much credit for was unloaded on the Government at eight times its assessed value. In other words, he is a man who is disposed to help the Government by "causing" it to buy something at five or six times its market value, and then boasts of it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. How does the gentleman explain the statement that this property, which he says is comparatively valueless, appears to be assessed at $7,000?

Mr. SIMS. $7,500 per acre. I do not know, but Mr. Glover in the same testimony says that the land is now worth two to four million dollars on account of the rapid increase in value, but he never told the committee that many hundred thousands of dollars had been expended in improving the western portion of the land.

Another thing about which I think Mr. Glover was not candid or frank: In all the hearings that I have read, before the Committee on Appropriations, and in all of the talks that I had with Mr. Glover himself, or had up to the time this bill was considered, he never for one time told us that a then Member of the House owned part of the land embraced in this option. According to Mr. Glover's statement the land was worth over $11,000 an acre at the time he made the statement, and he was buying it for $4,000 an acre. He was simply offering to sell it to the Government without profit, but the Member of the House who owned part of the land was offering to sell it to the Government through that option at a loss, which was no discredit, if the facts had only been known. Why did he not tell us that one of our own Members thought so much of this for park purposes that he had agreed to let his part of the land go at this reduced, sacrificial price; but not a word of this did he ever mention. In the hearings before the subcommittee of the District Committee he never said a word about 17½ acres having been since deeded to the District of Columbia, and in a long statement of his, in which he tells what he had to do in acquiring Rock Creek Park, he goes on to state that afterwards he bought some land beyond a reservoir out on Sixteenth Street at from $1,000 to $2,500 an acre. He states also that since that time he has sold some of the land that cost him $1,000 to $1,100 an acre for $11,000 an acre. What else does he say? He claims to be the father of Rock Creek Park, the father of the movement. In his characteristically modest language, as will be seen all through these reports and hearings, he says that he caused the bill to be introduced; that he caused it to pass—"I did this, I did that, I did the other"—and among other things that he named three of the commissioners who were appointed to look after this Rock Creek original acquisition.

I desire to refer here to a section in the law by which Rock Creek Park was acquired. The law says, in reference to the acquisition of Rock Creek Park, that the—commission having ascertained the cost of the land, including expenses, shall assess such proportion of such costs and expenses upon the land, lots, and blocks situated in the District of Columbia especially benefited by reason of the location and improvement of said park, as nearly as may be in proportion to the benefits resulting to such real estate.

What are the facts? There never was a dollar of improvements assessed against any of the abutting property, any of the adjoining land that was sold, according to his own statement, at eight times the assessed value. Yet he has the nerve to say that there was no improvements, no added value to the adjoining lands, when he admits himself that long afterwards he bought some land near this park at $1,000 to $1,100 an acre and has since sold it for $11,000 an acre.

When the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] called his attention to this and asked why these assessments for benefits could not still be made, what does this modest man say? He replied:

Mr. Perry could give you the fullest information on the points on which you wish to be informed. I hope Mr. GEORGE'S suggestion will not be carried out, however, as I own quite a little patch of land out there.

He says that he hopes Mr. GEORGE'S suggestion will not be carried out, because he owns a little patch of land there, and the record shows by his own statement that it is 45 or 50 acres This public-spirited, high-minded gentleman, who is working for the public good, and who, as a result of the purchase of this land by the Government at eight times its assessed value, has property of his own, acquired since that time, which is now worth six, seven, or eight, or ten times as much as it was then, is not willing that the benefits be assessed against the adjoining property.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In this Rock Creek Park matter did not a majority of the House vote with the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SIMS. Why, it was almost a solid vote.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I thought.

Mr. SIMS. Only 31 Members on the roll call of March 3, 1909, voted to pass that bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman feel that he has the confidence of the House in the proposition that he is stating, and that he has had it all along in this Rock Creek matter?

Mr. SIMS. From everything that I can see, I think I have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was wondering whether the confidence of the House was not enough to satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. But here is a sworn statement put into the record of hearings by a committee of this House, and I feel that it is due to Mr. ANDRUS, an old and honest Member of the House from the State of New York, to state the facts. Mr. ANDRUS read a report from the Senate committee, and made no statement which was unauthorized by that report, with the exception that he read a part that applied to the wrong tract of land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the original proposition did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS] vote with the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I think most of the Members of the House stood with him.

Mr. SIMS. All but 31.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it not the sentiment of the House, as expressed by the vote, that the price asked for that land was entirely too high?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; 31 for and 192 against was the vote.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was wondering whether the gentleman ought not to be entirely satisfied with the situation as it is.

Mr. SIMS. I am satisfied so far as those Members of the House are concerned who know anything about it. But every newspaper in Washington printed in substance what this gentleman has stated, and one paper printed the entire matter as related by him. It must have been a paid advertisement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have so much respect for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that I hoped he would not get so serious over what the newspapers say, because they say things about every Member of the House, and it is just as likely to happen to one as to another. And if everyone was to rise to a question of personal privilege because of newspaper reports there would not be much time for any other business.

Mr. SIMS. If it had been a newspaper report only I would not have said anything about it. But it is a sworn statement and a permanent record of the committee.

I want the Members of this House and of the next House to understand this thing. I have always had a suspicion of anybody who gets option on lands and comes to try to sell them to the Government. The Government does not need anybody's option. Private concerns have to do this thing. They have to get land by contract. The United States has the power of condemnation and can acquire it in spite of the owner, and the owner is entitled to full value for it, and I do not think it reflects any credit upon a banker of large means to have acquired an option on land at not much more than one-third of its value from private owners and then sell it to the Government even without profit, which is abundantly able to pay all that it is worth. Another thing: I do not approve of the members of the District government going around and getting options on land in this District and then lobbying in either House to have us purchase it. That thing will come again, or things like it, and it is very well for Members of the House to know how these things go. A great Government, worth billions of dollars, with the power of condemnation over every foot of land in this District, can acquire any property it needs, and ought to pay every dollar it is worth. To the extent that I had any part in defeating that bill I am proud of it; I saved the Government $70,000 for 17½ acres, even at the option price. And what else? I saved to you in round numbers $200,000 if the property had been acquired by condemnation, because these 17½ acres have since been given us absolutely for nothing. If I, by anything I did, caused this gentleman's option to expire, so that it was returned to the people who owned that land, and had paid for it, and it is now worth to them two to four millions of dollars, it seems to me they ought to get up and call Mr. ANDRUS blessed. I say that I am opposed to this option business. I hope it will never come up again in this or any other Congress. Let the Congress buy, as it always has bought, under its right of eminent domain, by condemnation. It may pay more for Rock Creek land, as it does in every case, than the market price, but the citizen is entitled to all the property is worth against the Government as purchaser.

As I said to Mr. Glover a few years ago, when he said he was going to quit and have nothing to do with it, that I thought he had done enough, and that I did not blame him for retiring from the field of action, as the Members of the House had not been convinced, and there was no use of him wasting his valuable time among Members of Congress who seemed averse to what he advocated.

Now, I have not said any unkind word in the way of adverse comment on Mr. Glover, but I will leave the question to you as to whether Mr. ANDRUS or myself ought to be expelled.

CONGRATULATIONS OF PORTO RICO ASSEMBLY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SAN JUAN, January 11, 1913.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington:

The House of Delegates of Porto Rico upon the opening of the seventh legislative assembly tenders to the House of Representatives of the United States its profound homage of sincere fraternity. Our house, the genuine representation of the people of Porto Rico, after 14 years of reiterated and fruitless demands for liberty and justice, now has absolute confidence that the cause of the great Democratic victory, the principles proclaimed by Jefferson, will from the Capitol and the White House reach Porto Rico. Our people request a new constitution providing for two elective houses, ample legislative powers in all local matters, an executive cabinet composed of bona fide residents of Porto Rico, and other measures of self-government worthy of the high sense of justice of the American people and of the demonstrated capacity and natural right of the people of Porto Rico.

JOSE DEDIEGO, Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BATHRICK, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 23069.

TOWN SITES IN CONNECTION WITH RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House upon this matter for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, when this matter came up last Wednesday I was not then informed concerning the condition of my colleague, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, who reported this bill. Since then I have ascertained that he will be here on Saturday, and therefore I would like the House to pass this bill over until next Wednesday, when he can have charge of it. And I ask, therefore, unanimous consent for the passing of this bill from to-day's calendar until next Wednesday's calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] asks unanimous consent that on account of the probable appearance of his colleague, Mr. TAYLOR, who had charge of this bill and reported it, by next Wednesday, that this matter go over until that time as unfinished business.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman's request mean that it will come up next Wednesday the first thing, or would it be postponed for any other unfinished business that went over from to-day until next Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not really understand the request the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] preferred. The Chair understands that the House can start in with another bill and have it unfinished business next Wednesday.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. My request is, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, that this bill go over without prejudice and be called up on next Wednesday, just as it is called up to-day, as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold that if the request is granted, if the House starts on another bill to-day and it is not finished, that the latter bill would have the right of way.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In the instance the Chair now states, is it correct that, on the disposition of that business, although it might take all of to-day and take both matters over to the following Wednesday, this matter would lose its place?

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is purely arbitrary. But in the judgment of the Chair this bill would follow whatever was unfinished. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will call the committees.

ALIEN INSANE.

Mr. BURNETT (when the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization was called). Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to call up the bill H. R. 19544, House Calendar No. 195.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19544) to amend section 9 of the immigration act approved February 20, 1907.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the immigration act approved February 20, 1907, be amended as follows:

"After the word 'epileptics' insert the words 'insane persons,' so that section 9 shall read as follows:

"'SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel to bring to the United States any alien subject to any of the following disabilities: Idiots, imbeciles, epileptics, insane persons, or persons afflicted with tuberculosis or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of the provisions of this section; and no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, and in the event such fine is imposed, while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.'"

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, there are one or two verbal amendments to that bill. The purpose of the bill is to penalize the steamship companies for bringing in alien insane. As the law now is, the steamship companies are penalized and required to pay a fine of $100 for bringing in people who are idiots, imbeciles, epileptics, and so on, and, while the alien insane are excludable and deportable now, there is no penalty on the steamship companies for bringing them in.

That is one change. The other change is to increase the penalty in that section from $100 to $200. It is now $100 in the present law, as it stands now. This is to increase that.

I think the bill has the approval of the entire committee, according to my recollection. I know that some gentlemen tried to get it up by unanimous consent a few days ago. Certain gentlemen from New York were very much in favor of it, and gentlemen from other States along the Atlantic seaboard were in favor of it, because the insane asylums in cities along the Atlantic seaboard are being filled with alien insane; and, as I said before, while they are deportable, there is no penalty on the steamship companies under existing law for bringing them in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have just been able to get a copy of the bill. I wanted to ask the gentleman if any change has been made in this bill? I could not hear the earlier part of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BURNETT. Change in existing law?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Change in the bill. The gentleman referred to a couple of committee amendments.

Mr. BURNETT. It is apparent on the face of the bill what they are. In the original bill section 9 of the immigration act approved February 20, 1907, is proposed to be amended so as to read as follows:

After the word "epileptics" insert the words "insane persons."

Instead of that we amend it "so as to read as follows," and then put in the entire section amended.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This adds to the classes to be excluded? It adds insane persons, and increases the penalty on the steamship companies from $100 to $200?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. The insane are excludable now, but there is no penalty, as I say, imposed on the steamship company for bringing them in. It adds insane as one of the classes, and increases the penalty from $100 to $200 for bringing in any of those classes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand there are no serious objections to the bill—certainly not on my part—if it is the bill that the committee agreed upon. I ask these questions because I have had no opportunity to examine the bill—the print not being here. Listening to the gentleman's statement I was confused by the remark that there had been some changes of committee amendments.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, none of committee amendments.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether he would have any objection to eliminating that exception in the bill and make it applicable to the railroads as well as to the steamship companies? If it is wrong for the steamship companies to bring in the insane, why is it not just as wrong for the railroads to bring them in from Canada and Mexico?

Mr. BURNETT. I think it is. The attention of the committee was not called to that point.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman ever taken into consideration the question of the expense to the railroad or transportation companies to have experts investigate, for instance, as to the sanity of passengers on all railroad trains? I can illustrate it no better than by saying that in my section of the country a train may have two or three hundred immigrants coming into this country from Mexico. Now, if this bill is to apply to the railroad companies, they would necessarily have to detain that train when it got to the border line for a sufficient length of time to enable an expert to examine all the passengers to determine whether or not any of them were insane and deportable.

Now, this law could properly apply to the steamship companies, because they have plenty of time in which to ascertain whether their passengers are of the nature or character that is described in this bill, whereas the railroad companies coming from Mexico or from Canada could not take the time to do that because they are making two or three daily passages to this country.

I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] that the complaints which this bill is intended to reach come from New York principally as to the steamship companies, and you have had no complaint from those people who have had to take care of insane coming from Mexico and Canada.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BURNETT. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts after I shall have concluded with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. I would prefer that this amendment be not made now, and that the bill be not incumbered with it.

The argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is not a good one, from the fact that these people are now required to come in at the ports of entry that are established all along the Canadian border line and the Mexican border, and the immigrants have to be examined at those ports of entry; and for that reason it would be no greater hardship to examine them as to their sanity than to examine them as to any other question, as, for example, the question of head tax. If they have lived in Canada for a certain length of time, they have had to pay a head tax on coming from other countries. I think that the argument of the gentleman from Texas is not a good one.

However, I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] will not offer an amendment and will let the bill go in as it is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Alabama would admit that amendment, would he not raise at once the question of the expense and supervision at all the railroad stations and crossings on both border lines?

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, of course, there is no question about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the inconvenience to passengers from holding up trains?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; all that was referred to by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It involves a big, broad question, which will probably interfere with the passage of this bill.

Mr. BURNETT. I think it ought not to be injected into the bill now.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the principal purpose of this bill is to prevent the infliction of misery on an alien who comes from a long distance away—say Armenia—and gets to Ellis Island and finds that he must be turned back. Experience has shown that the steamship companies often bring doubtful immigrants here on the chance that they will be admitted. This bill is intended to discourage them from taking chances. It is largely a humanitarian bill. No such circumstances surround the rejection of aliens who come here by rail. He has not come from a long distance. He has not made a journey half way around the world in vain. The expense, difficulty, and delay would be great, by the way, in applying this law to the ferryboats crossing from Windsor to Detroit were it not for the fact that the same passengers cross back and forth every day. The reasons which call for this legislation do not apply to emigrants coming from foreign contiguous territory.

Mr. BURNETT. I will state to the gentleman that, as was stated by the gentleman from Texas, there has been no complaint from these border States. The complaint comes entirely from the seaport States—Massachusetts, New York, and other States—where the steamship companies bring in these insane.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] desires to address himself to the bill, but I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for a question.

Mr. MANN. I wish to ask a question. The bill, as I understand, only inserts insane persons in this paragraph, and doubles the penalty on the steamship companies.

Mr. BURNETT. That is all.

Mr. MANN. Now, supposing a man is in fact insane when he embarks at some place in Europe to come to this country, but gives no general appearance of insanity. While he is on shipboard he shows that he is insane. Of course, when he comes here he is excluded. Are the steamship companies to be fined for that because they have not made a competent medical examination by an expert alienist before the man starts? A competent medical examination for insanity means a careful examination by an expert alienist, and usually requires days of observation.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to say, in answer to my colleague, that the bill provides that if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected——

Mr. MANN. By means of a competent medical examination.

Mr. SABATH. By means of a competent medical examination at such time.

Mr. MANN. Which means that every person who comes from abroad must have a competent expert alienist examine him as to his mental condition, because no one can tell by a casual observation whether a man is sane or insane unless he is a maniac. The steamship companies can not tell unless they have an expert alienist examine him, and sometimes that requires days of observation, and even then they will not agree.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no question——

Mr. FOSTER. There is a question about that.

Mr. MANN. About their agreeing?

Mr. FOSTER. About their agreeing, and the reason why. I will say to my colleague that there is no line of demarcation where you can say that upon this side of that line every man is sane and on the other side every man is insane; but there is a large borderland in which possibly no man can say whether people are sane or insane.

Mr. MANN. That is true; and there is a borderland condition in which it takes some time to ascertain.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with my colleague that unless the symptoms are pronounced no man can tell on a casual examination whether a person is sane or insane.

Mr. MANN. The existing law forbids insane persons coming into the country.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The only purpose of this amendment, so far as insane persons are concerned, is to invoke a penalty against the steamship companies for bringing them in.

Mr. BURNETT. That is it.

Mr. MANN. Of course, if a man is insane and the steamship company brings him here, they ought to be fined, but it seems to me somebody ought to have the authority not to require the fine when it would be impossible to have the services of an expert alienist—and that is what a "competent medical examination" means—to examine everybody in advance.

Mr. BURNETT. The same argument might apply against fining them for bringing in tuberculosis patients. Perhaps it would require considerable examination to detect that.

Mr. FOSTER. I take it that this provision in the bill means that an alien coming to this country would present to the steamship company a certificate from a recognized reputable physician in that country from which he comes certifying to the fact that he was of sound mind and body, and that all the steamship company would be expected to do would be to take that sort of a certificate and admit the man; but it would hardly be expected under the provisions of this bill that the company must have a certificate from an expert in that particular line.

Mr. MANN. What is the practice in the administration of the law now? Do the steamship companies take the certificate of any physician?

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no. There is an examination when they get here, and one result of it is that on account of the congested conditions at New York there are so many who escape examination and the vigilance of the New York authorities that in the State of New York alone the alien insane are costing them $4,000,000 a year; and I notice that just before Gov. Sulzer was inaugurated, Gov. Dix was discussing the calling of a convention of twelve or fifteen of those States whose asylums are being overrun by these people, to take some action to memorialize Congress, asking that the Federal Government support these insane because they allow them to escape the Ellis Island examination and get in. Even if it were to work hardship occasionally, it seems to me better to require this than that this great influx of alien insane should be continued as it has been for the last few years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this bill puts the burden on the steamship company to detect insane persons, and if detected on arrival at the port the steamship company would have to carry them back, and the steamship company would be fined $200 under this bill. Now, there were alienists before the committee—and I say this for the information of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], who is a distinguished physician—who contended that by merely looking at a man, a specialist trained in the matter of insanity could detect symptoms of insanity; that a man standing at the port and looking at a line of people could pick out those who showed signs of being mentally unbalanced.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be in a certain proportion of cases. But there are a large number, as suggested by my colleague, that it would require a considerable length of time to determine whether a person was sane or insane. For instance, in the Army, in recruiting men for the service, at the large recruiting stations, there is an alienist whose duty it is to observe men enlisted into the Army. They sit there and study the young men from day to day and determine whether they are likely to go insane from some cause that may be brought out in the Army. They are not able to tell by a casual examination whether or not the young man is insane or sane at that particular time, and so they study them for that reason. There are cases, I will say to the gentleman, that are so plain that no one could make a mistake. A certificate given by a physician that that person was sane would involve the steamship company either paying a fine or refusing to accept the physician's affidavit from that particular locality.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not want to bring on any difference of opinion between experts.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I am no expert.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have said that there were witnesses before the committee in support of the bill which provided that alienists should be placed at the various ports to inspect the incoming immigrants, who said that specialists could detect those that were mentally unbalanced, as subjects for special treatment. Their testimony was so clear that I felt that even if members of the committee had to pass, as we do between the tellers, with those alienists standing by, there might be some question whether some of us would get through.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me suggest this to the gentleman, that what they meant was, for instance, in a line of people passing along there may be those that they suspect who would be taken away for further observation. That is probably what they meant when they stated what they did.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am speaking in the time of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. I will yield.

Mr. CARY. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who lives in the city of Philadelphia, where these boats arrive, is it true that many men desert ships when they arrive on this side and that vessels go back without a full crew?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is one of the real evils of the immigration law. Men do come to this country shipping as sailors, and I question whether the bill we passed at the last session, the seaman's bill, is effective in this respect. I undertook to offer an amendment to cover that point and it was rejected.

Mr. CARY. They desert and get away and no track is kept of the men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are gone, but if they are detected by means of their own confession they may be apprehended and deported. The moment they leave the ship they are gone.

Mr. CARY. Has the gentleman any information as to the rumor which I have heard quite frequently—that men who can not pass an examination at the originating port in some way arrange with the steward and hire out as a sailor for the very purpose of getting over here and then deserting?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is getting down to an interesting point, in which there may be some basis of fact. The question raised by the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago involved that proposition—that we should inspect the emigrants on the other side of the water and not wait until they get over here and inspect them and take the chance of losing some of them. Shall we put the burden on the steamship company of examining the emigrants before they enter the vessel or put the Government of the United States to the expense of apprehending them after they get here?

Mr. TALCOTT of New York rose.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I have yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I now yield two minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I yield first to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT].

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is it a fact that many countries across the water object to making inspection there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think some of them do. I do not think there is a great desire on the part of the Italian Government to promote emigration.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Are there not some countries that have objected to it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I think Germany has objected to it, and wants to hold her people.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for a question.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama in reference to his bill. The law now prevents insane persons being admitted to the United States?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. In the event a steamship company should bring an insane person, a person that they know to be insane or should have known to be insane by the exercise of reasonable diligence, would there be any penalty now attached to the steamship company for bringing such an insane person here?

Mr. BURNETT. Not at all; that is what this bill seeks to accomplish.

Mr. SISSON. The bill is really for the enforcement of the present law?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; and to enlarge it.

Mr. SISSON. The law as it now stands is nugatory, because when they do bring the insane person here no penalty is attached to it, and they do not have to carry them back, and they become a charge to the respective States where they come. Is that true?

Mr. BURNETT. They are required to carry them back, and they can be sent back by the steamship company, but no penalty is attached to it. If they escape and get out into the country there is a great deal of trouble to get them deported, and they can not be deported unless you get an order from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor on the company to carry them back.

Mr. SISSON. And in the meantime there is a charge on the community?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; and on that line this is asked for by the governor of New York, and I notice last year there was an agreement between the steamship company and the hospitals by which the company did agree to take back several hundred that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor had not issued a warrant for.

But it leaves it entirely optional with them to take them back, unless the Secretary of Commerce and Labor orders them deported by these lines, and this is to penalize them for bringing them over.

Mr. SISSON. It was suggested that in a great many countries there was an objection made to the inspection of an immigrant. Would not this law require ship companies to be more careful about the acceptance of an immigrant in foreign ports, and thereby give us the same protection that the Government of those countries decline to give?

Mr. BURNETT. That is the purpose of the law—to make the steamship companies more careful.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Alabama has pointed out to the gentleman from Mississippi the crux of the proposition.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY. I merely wish to inquire of my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], whether or not he understands this evil or unfortunate condition that has been pointed out by the chairman of the committee, as to the burdens placed upon local communities in the care of insane immigrants who have been brought over by the steamship companies, to be a local condition. My understanding is that we are able to transport them back, and the steamship companies are required to transport aliens to the country whence they came, just as soon as the place they came from is determined, and that fact is frequently determined in Massachusetts under our insane hospital boards. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he thinks it is a bad condition from which we are suffering?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the whole of the gentleman's question, but perhaps I can answer it. Of course when an insane person is turned back in the port of Boston, he is deported at once in the vessel in which he came and at the expense of the steamship company that brought him.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If that insane person stays a certain length of time and is found in Boston, he is sent back at the expense of the company. If he has gone into the interior, my impression is that half of the expense to the port of embarkation is borne by the company and half by the United States Government. If he has been here more than a certain length of time, I think three years, we have no power to deport him at all. The gentleman from Alabama can tell me whether that is correct or not.

Mr. BURNETT. That is my recollection of the existing law.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. As I recollect it offhand, that is the existing law.

Mr. MURRAY. And that is upon the theory that the condition may have been caused since the time of entry into the United States?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And also on the general feeling that we must make some limit. For instance, suppose the causes arose prior to entry into the United States, but that after entry the immigrant had married a wife and had children born to him in this country. We have come to the conclusion, after a good deal of discussion, that three years is about the correct time within which deportation may be made, except in the case of prostitutes and procurers, where under another law the Congress of the United States thought otherwise.

Mr. MURRAY. I am not out of sympathy with the legislation, if it seems to be desirable, from the local point of view and from the general point of view, but I have not seen anything in the bill that is at all supplementary of what we now have. In other words, I was inclined to believe that we had pretty general power to look after the situation as it is.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is correct, but experience has shown that these steamship companies will take a big risk if the only penalty is deportation at their expense; whereas, if we put a fine on them for bringing into the country inadmissible aliens, when they could have found out previously that the alien ought not to come in, they will be much more unwilling to take that risk. That is the purpose of the act, as I understand it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman's question of whether there has been any complaint, particularly from his section, I would state that quite a number of the North Atlantic States have made complaints through their boards of alienists. My recollection is that we have had very urgent complaints by those in charge of the insane hospitals of the gentleman's State. I have not the data before me and have not examined the matter lately, but that is my recollection. I know we have had complaints from Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York, and I think from Massachusetts.

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask the gentleman to incorporate that in his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. If I have the statement I will incorporate it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the membership of this House. All I desire to say is this: I am in favor of this bill. Furthermore, I am in favor of enlarging the scope of the bill and of including also the examination of all those aliens that come in here from contiguous territory, namely, those that come by railroad. This bill excludes all insane that seek to enter the United States from foreign territory. I am of opinion that an insane person is just as insane if he comes from Mexico or Canada as if he comes from England, Germany, or France.

And therefore I have suggested to the chairman of the committee to accept the amendment which would eliminate these words:

Other than railway lines.

So that we would force not only the steamship lines but also the railroad companies to carefully examine all those who are probably suffering from insanity. The present law excludes all of these. All that we desire to do is to impose higher fines on the steamship companies so as to force more careful examination in order to protect the unfortunate immigrant from being turned away after he arrives in this country.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. SISSON. Has the gentleman considered the condition of the facilities of the steamship companies for making examinations, and the facilities of the railroad companies coming from Canada or Mexico?

Mr. SABATH. Well, if I am not mistaken, we have very few lines that run between Mexico and the United States. I would say there are six border lines.

Mr. SISSON. I am not informed about the condition, but it just occurred to me that there may be a good deal of difference in the method of handling the railway passenger and the way of handling the ship passenger, and it might require a different kind of legislation. I will say to the gentleman I am in entire sympathy with his views.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] to the fact that there is a street railroad running across the Rio Grande where the fare is 10 cents. Does the gentleman think it right to force the railroad company to maintain a force of physicians and to fine the company $200 if it brings an alien here and it is found subsequently that he is insane?

Mr. SABATH. It might be a hardship to that street railway company; but if they are bringing hundreds and hundreds of people over here from Canada, why should we not protect ourselves on that border as well as on any other border?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. One other question: The gentleman is aware that the examination of European immigrants who come here through Canada takes place in the Canadian ports by agreement between the two Governments, and not on our border.

Mr. SABATH. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And suppose after a United States inspector has passed an immigrant in the port of Montreal and that that immigrant is found to be insane after he came to the United States and after having been passed by the inspector in the port of Montreal, would he consider it just to charge the railroad company $100 for bringing him in?

Mr. SABATH. Well, personally, I do not know whether under the present law they would not be subjected to a fine.

Of course, at the present time they are excluded, it is true, but if by chance they are brought across the channel on a boat, it matters not how small it may be, plying between some two points across a narrow strip of water, the boat would come under the provisions of this act. And if it is good law for a steamship line, why should it not be as good for the railroad? Personally, of course, the gentleman recognizes the fact that I am not trying in any way to eliminate the steamship companies from performing their duties.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I understand.

Mr. SABATH. I believe that this is a good provision, and that we have a right to demand from the steamship lines that they should be careful in examining the people they are bringing to this country; but I go further and say that we should make some demand on the railroads.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Let us take the Quebec Central Railroad, which runs from Quebec to Boston, part of the way over the Central Vermont. I suppose the trains may stop at 30 or 40 places between the St. Lawrence and the border. At each one of those stations passengers are likely to board the train. Does the gentleman think it right that the railroad should be required to have surgeons at each of those stations.

Mr. SABATH. The railroad company would not need to have specialists at each of those stations. It would suffice if they had one at the last station and examine all of those who were about to cross. So, instead of having one in each and every station, it would suffice to have one or two at the port of entry.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And the gentleman would advocate, for instance, legislation which would produce this state of affairs: Suppose I came back, for instance, from Quebec in the daytime, as I often do, my train would be stopped by the railroad authorities pending the examination of persons for lunacy before we reached the United States line, and, after crossing it, would be stopped for examination once more?

Mr. SABATH. Notwithstanding the fact that I have not a great deal of confidence in these alienists or experts, I do hope that they would have sense enough not to interfere with the gentleman from Massachusetts when they saw him arrive, and that they would be easily able to detect that he does not come under the provisions of any of these exclusions.

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], if the situation that he assumes is less reasonable than the situation that is likely to come as the result of the probable passage of the literacy test at Detroit, where every day, as I understand it, hundreds of men come across the river to go to their daily employment and occupation in the city of Detroit, but where, in the future, under the provisions of the literacy test, if it becomes a law, as it is likely to do, they will daily have to be stopped while they read for the inspectors 30 or 40 words in the language they are supposed to speak?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts time to answer the question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I expect that at first there is going to be some difficulty such as the gentleman indicates connected with the enforcement of the illiteracy test. I think the evolution will be approximately the same as has resulted from existing law. The immigrant inspectors know practically everybody by sight who goes from Windsor to Detroit.

Mr. MURRAY. Is the gentleman unwilling to trust the operation of a wise provision such as the gentleman from Illinois suggests?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; but the railroads are an entirely different proposition. The ferryboat runs between two places, and it is very easy to become familiar with the passengers who habitually go to and from the same places every day. With passengers on railroad trains, however, it is entirely different.

Mr. MURRAY. Of course, that is true, and the number varies, and the persons from day to day vary on railroad trains to a greater extent than on steamships or ferryboats going from Windsor to Detroit. But could there not be some development under the law by wise administrators that would cure the defects which the gentleman conceives would make this law ridiculous as applied to railroads?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No. You are going to put a penalty on the railroads for bringing the people here.

Mr. MURRAY. You are only going to penalize the railroads for doing the same thing that the steamship companies are penalized for doing under the law. The gentleman is unfair in his language when he says that that is our plan.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. What is the plan that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. MURRAY. To penalize the railroads for doing the same thing that the steamship companies under this are penalized for doing.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. What is that?

Mr. MURRAY. Bringing in the insane.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Before the gentleman came on the floor of the House I endeavored to explain that there had been a very great demand that these immigrants should be protected against taking a journey half way around the world after selling their household goods, only to be turned back on arrival at the port of New York. I pointed out the difference between being turned back after a short land trip and being turned back after a trip from the other side of the world.

Mr. MURRAY. This measure is chiefly a measure of humanity for the suffering conditions now existing in the various States. I gathered the idea from the remarks of the chairman of the committee [Mr. BURNETT] that it was intended to protect such States as New York and Massachusetts, and the Nation generally, from the undesirable immigrants that we are getting. If the purpose is other than that I have entirely mistaken the progress of this debate, but I do hope that along the line of the suggestion that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] wisely makes his amendment may be made covering those immigrants that come in under the other conditions.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has expired.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman have his time extended.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Alabama has control of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] has control of the time.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED], the author of the bill, and I want myself about five minutes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me two minutes?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Does not the amendment amending the section refer to all excluded classes, as well as the insane?

Mr. SABATH. Yes. It includes the insane. Formerly they were not included.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. The gentleman's suggestion covers all classes?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; all these classes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I stated, I am in favor of the bill, and I desire to go even further than the gentleman who has drafted this bill, and I am in favor of making the bill apply to the railroads. For that reason I move that the words on line 9, after the word "company," be stricken out, namely "other than railway lines," so that the section of the bill would read:

It shall be unlawful for any person, including transportation companies entering the United States—

And so on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that he has the floor for the purpose of debate and not for the purpose of offering an amendment. After the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] expires, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois, provided the gentleman from Alabama does not cut him off by the previous question.

Mr. SABATH. I presume he could do it under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. He could do it if he could get votes enough.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, have the two minutes of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT] expired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's two minutes have expired.

Mr. BURNETT. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED].

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, as the author of this bill, I desire to refer very briefly to the aspect of humanity involved in it, which has been mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] and others. In the first place, if the bringing in of the insane is made finable, the steamship companies and common carriers will refrain from allowing the insane to commence the trip.

At present the fact of their being brought in entails great hardships to individuals and to whole families. I have known personally of cases of insane who will be finable and excludable under this proposed act to stay at Ellis Island and first be detained indefinitely and then be taken to the almshouses and various institutions at great expense to the public in the first place, and in instances where the families are possessed of means the expense is chargeable directly to their relatives who live in this country.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. I will yield for a minute.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that under the present law the Government has the right to deport these people at any time within three years?

Mr. KINDRED. I will say to the gentleman that the bringing in of insane into this country is not finable under the present law.

Mr. SABATH. But they are deportable. Does not the gentleman know that last year we deported 524 insane?

Mr. KINDRED. They are deportable, and the very process of deportation and care for them is costing the State of New York over $2,500,000 each year.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the Government pays for the deportation and the passage of the insane, and the State of New York is not obliged to expend a single cent?

Mr. KINDRED. As a matter of fact, the board of alienists, as the proper agency of the State of New York, is doing this work and charging it to the State of New York directly. In some cases the United States Government pays it.

Mr. SABATH. They make examinations, and of course we realize that they are very expensive gentlemen.

Mr. KINDRED. I want to make a statement along the line not of the economics of this great humanitarian question but along the line of humanity, as some gentleman has defined it. Not only, as I have stated, is it inhuman and cruel and inconvenient to the individual insane and their families to bring them here under the present conditions, subjecting them to the hardships to which I have briefly referred——

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINDRED. I have only a very brief time. Otherwise I would gladly yield.

We come now to the question of humanity involved in this, and that is the lesson which we get from the Jukes family, which in the matter of degeneracy from heredity represents a most colossal family tree and a most interesting one, perhaps the most interesting in the world. The origin of the Jukes family from a given parent was an origin of insanity. The descendants of that family ramify throughout the States, and the result has been not only calamity to the individuals who, through no fault of their own, came into the world under such abnormal conditions through such heredity, but our asylums and eleemosynary institutions have been caused untold expense. Therefore it is a question secondarly of economics and primarily of humanity to the individual and a question of the greatest social importance. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that where this deportation is not done under the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the expense of it has to be borne either by the State or by private individuals; and the case to which I called attention a moment ago was a case where the State of New York, through some of its officials, had made a tentative agreement with the steamship companies by which there would be a deportation, as the paper stated, of something like 1,500 of these aliens who have gone recently into the insane asylums of New York, and the State is to bear the expense of that kind of deportation. Under the Federal law if the deportation is on the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the steamship companies bear the expense of deportation; but they say that there are many cases that have escaped the investigation of Ellis Island, have gotten out, and gotten into the asylums, and in those cases the Secretary of Commerce and Labor will not order the deportation, and hence the steamship companies are in nowise responsible, and they will not take these people back unless somebody pays the expense of their passage. This newspaper article said that the State of New York had agreed to pay the expense of the deportation.

There is another difficulty. In some cases the country from which they have come refuses to take them back, and it puts them in an anomalous attitude. The steamship companies have made that excuse for refusing to deport them. The country that they come from will not receive them.

Therefore, as has been said by gentlemen, the putting of the penalty upon the steamship companies will increase the diligence of those companies in the investigation on the other side, because if they are penalized for bringing them in they will not bring them over here, and the trouble caused by the refusal of the mother country to take them back will be avoided.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] has referred to a similar anomalous condition that might arise along the border in regard to the railways. We have in the general law now and also in the Dillingham bill, if it should be passed as amended, and with amendments that perhaps the conference committee may agree upon, a provision that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may make agreements with the railroad companies along these borders, where there is a contiguous foreign country, for the purpose of expediting this traffic. So the statement of the gentleman that a man who comes over from Canada on a street railway or a steam railroad will have to be examined every day to ascertain whether he can read or not is incorrect. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor arranged with the railway companies a method by which that examination might be made at one time, and the person admitted after that time.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, was the provision that the gentleman speaks of in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives?

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman had read the existing law, he would know that that is the law already; and the bill that passed the House of Representatives did not propose to amend that law.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman correct in saying that the bill we voted on, the amended Senate bill, did not propose to amend the existing law? It proposed an amendment to the existing law in the first paragraph of it, and the gentleman knows that I read the bill, because I read it with him. It changed existing law, and the objection I suggest was pointed out in debate on the floor of the House——

Mr. BURNETT. Does the gentleman, in asking his question, intend to interlard it with a speech?

Mr. MURRAY. No.

Mr. BURNETT. The Senate bill does not amend that feature of the existing law. It adds to the classes already excluded and leaves the existing law, with its 42 sections, absolutely as it is already.

I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to the final passage.

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman reserve that motion for a moment in order that I may ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURNETT. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. That precludes me from offering my amendment, does it not?

The SPEAKER. It does, provided enough gentlemen vote for that motion. If a majority vote the other way, then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is entitled to an hour if the Chair recognizes him, which he will do.

The question being taken, the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "amended," insert the words "so as to read."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, strike out all of lines 6 and 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMENDING THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

The SPEAKER. Is that all the business that this committee has?

Mr. BURNETT. No, Mr. Speaker; I call up the bill (H. R. 20195) to amend the naturalization laws.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," is hereby amended by adding two subdivisions to read as follows:

"Seventh. That any alien of the age of 21 years and upward who has enlisted or may hereafter enlist in the Armies of the United States, either the Regular or the Volunteer forces, or in the United States Navy or Marine Corps, or in the Revenue-Cutter Service, or who is serving or has served on board a merchant vessel of the United States may, after three years of such service, while still in the service or within six months after an honorable discharge therefrom, petition for naturalization in any court authorized to grant citizenship; and the honorable-discharge certificate of such alien from the service of the United States, or a certificate of such three years' service and good conduct during that time, signed by a commissioned officer under whom he is serving, or an affidavit of the master of said merchant vessel certifying to such three years' service and good conduct, as aforesaid, and the affidavits of two credible witnesses, citizens of the United States, identifying the applicant as the person named in the certificate presented, shall be deemed competent and sufficient proof of the residence and good moral character required by law, and either the original or a verified copy of such discharge shall be attached to and made a part of the petition; such applicant shall not be required to prove one year's residence within the State in which he files his application to become a citizen; and the petition of any such alien shall be docketed and final hearing had thereon by the court immediately, or at the convenience of the court.

"Eighth. That every seaman being an alien shall, after his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, and after he shall have served such three years upon such merchant vessel of the United States, be deemed a citizen of the United States for the purpose of manning and serving on board any such merchant vessel of the United States, anything to the contrary in any act of Congress notwithstanding; but such seaman shall, for all purposes of protection as an American citizen, be deemed such after the filing of his declaration of intention to become such citizen."

SEC. 2. That sections 2166 and 2174 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America, and so much of an act approved July 26, 1894, entitled "An act making provisions for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," being chapter 165 of the laws of 1894 (28 Stat. L., p. 124), reading as follows: "Any alien of the age of 21 years and upward who has enlisted or may enlist in the United States Navy or Marine Corps, and has served or may hereafter serve five consecutive years in the United States Navy or one enlistment in the United States Marine Corps, and has been or may hereafter be honorably discharged, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become such; and the court admitting such alien shall, in addition to proof of good moral character, be satisfied by competent proof of such person's service in and honorable discharge from the United States Navy or Marine Corps"; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; but nothing in this act shall repeal or in any way enlarge section 2169 of the Revised Statutes: Provided, That for the purposes of the prosecution of all crimes and offenses against the naturalization laws of the United States which may have been committed prior to this act the statutes and laws hereby repealed shall remain in full force and effect: Provided further, That as to all aliens who, prior to January 1, 1866, served in the Armies of the United States and were honorably discharged therefrom, section 2166 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be and remain in full force and effect, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to make uniform conditions under which aliens who have served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States may be naturalized. Also to extend to persons in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States the same provisions which are extended to alien seamen in the matter of naturalization.

As the situation is at present, any alien who serves in the Army of the United States can be naturalized on his declaration of intention to become a citizen after one year's service. Any alien who serves in the Navy must have five years' service to his credit. Anyone who serves in the Marine Corps must have such term of service to his credit as an enlistment in the Marine Corps may from time to time require. I rather think that the term of enlistment for the Marine Corps was made four years by an act passed somewhere about the year 1900.

This bill seeks to make uniform the conditions of naturalization for all aliens who have served either in the Regular or Volunteer forces of the United States, or in the United States Navy, or Marine Corps, or in the Revenue Service, or who have served on board a merchant vessel of the United States a uniform period of three years.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman, so that we may have it clear in mind, state just what provisions are in the law that a man would have to comply with in the absence of this legislation?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. To the best of my ability I shall be glad to do so, but this bill has been on the calendar many months, and I have not refreshed my memory until this afternoon.

Mr. HAMILL. I understand from a rapid reading of the bill that the seventh section extends the present requirement of one year to three years in the case of a discharged soldier from the United States Army. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. HAMILL. What is the necessity of adding to his term of probation? Is not his service of one year in the Army an indication of the patriotism desired of the coming citizen—is not that enough without making it a three-year period?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It did not seem so to the committee.

Mr. HAMILL. What is the gentleman's own opinion?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is the gentleman's own opinion. I voted to report this bill. As the law stands at present, as the gentleman has pointed out, only one year's service is required of a soldier. On the other hand, an alien in the Navy is required to serve five years, or one enlistment in the United States Marine Corps, which is now four years. The Immigration Committee has made the period uniform at three years for all the classes which I have mentioned.

Now, in regard to the alien seamen on merchant vessels, I think the report is a little wrong. At present the alien seamen on merchant vessels can be naturalized at the end of three years. This bill leaves it permissible to naturalize them at the end of three years.

Mr. HAMILL. In that regard this proposed law does not change the existing law in regard to a seaman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as I was about to say, my information is that the change in regard to seamen consists in permitting them to prove their three years' residence in a different way from that which is now required. The naturalization law passed in 1906 requires everyone to show by two witnesses evidence of their residence for the period of three years. This bill provides that the fact that seamen have served on a ship of the United States—that is, a merchant ship of the United States—and have been honorably discharged, shall in itself be taken as evidence of residence, inasmuch as it is impossible for a seaman to acquire a continuous residence ashore owing to the fact that he is in and out of port all the time.

Answering the gentleman from New Jersey, the three-year period required of seamen on merchant vessels is not changed by this bill from the requirement of section 2174 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HAMILL. I take it the gentleman draws this distinction between the proposed law and the law as it now exists—that the law as it exists calls for the proof of three years' residence, and the gentleman does not consider the three years' residence at sea would prove the residence, whereas this specifically says that three years' service at sea shall entitle him to the right of citizenship.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman for having stated it much more lucidly than I did. He is correct.

Mr. HAMILL. The gentleman will pardon me if I say I think the law to-day would consider three years' service on an American ship as proof of three years' citizenship in the United States, and that the proposed law does nothing really in that regard.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, the department says that it has not been construed that way; that while it ought to be, yet the existing law is such that if a man has been afloat all that time and has been one year at one port with his family and another year at another, he can not be naturalized.

Mr. HAMILL. On an American ship?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. That would not be construed as a residence at that place for the required time, and therefore the department recommended the changes in that way.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama, I think, is correct. Now, as to the evidence as to character, if I recollect rightly, there is a requirement that one of the witnesses as to character must come from the same State as the applicant. I am by no means sure. That is my impression, but I have not examined the law for eight months. There are two things of which I am sure. One is that under this bill the period of time is not changed during which a seaman on a merchant vessel is required to serve prior to attaining a right to naturalization. The other thing of which I am sure is that the main purpose of the bill is to provide uniform conditions for the naturalization of aliens in the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Revenue-Cutter Service, and the merchant marine.

I call attention to one exception in this bill. A soldier who served in the War of the Rebellion and was honorably discharged at the end of his service is allowed to secure citizenship, as formerly, after one year's service.

Mr. HAMILL. What is the provision as to the Marine Corps that they must serve for the same number of years as are included in one contract of enlistment?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is existing law. This bill makes the period three years. I understand the present term of enlistment for the Marine Corps is four years. I have not looked into that question, but am trusting entirely to my memory. I did not know that this bill was on the calendar until an hour ago, and have been trying to refresh my memory ever since.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the effort to establish uniformity in the matter of naturalization, was not it apparent to the committee that there was a decided advantage given to the sailor on the merchant vessel who in no way was in the service of the United States, in that he could be naturalized after three years of service upon a merchant vessel, where those who volunteered their services to the United States and served in the Army and the Navy were obliged to remain at least five years before they could become citizens?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. My recollection is that the gentleman is correct. I had not remembered that fact, but it comes back to me, now that he mentions it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that it was regarded as unfair that we should hold up for a period of five or more years a man who entered the service of the United States as a soldier or sailor, when we permitted a sailor on a merchant vessel in no way connected with the United States to be admitted to citizenship, after a period of three years of such service, under an independent captain or under an independent concern.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I would ask if the general idea of this bill is not restrictive—that is, it is to make it more difficult to-day for a man who has served his country as a soldier, or for a sailor on an American ship, to receive the rights of citizenship than it is under existing law? Outside of the uniformity feature, that is the effect of this law, is it not?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman is mistaken. This bill makes it easier for a sailor to become a citizen of the United States, because the present law requires him to prove something which is not a fact.

Mr. HAMILL. That is a detail of procedure, and in so far as that is concerned the proposed law is commendable. But what is the necessity of extending from one year to three years the time of a discharged soldier? That is restrictive.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. So as to make it uniform with the period of service required of a discharged sailor.

Mr. HAMILL. It is restrictive.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. As to soldiers.

Mr. HAMILL. Would it not be far better instead of putting more hardships on the soldier who has served his country rather to bring the other qualifications down to the qualifications now required of him as to residence?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. HAMILL. Why not?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Three years is short enough time for any man to be in the United States before he is made a citizen.

Mr. HAMILL. When a man serves in the Army, is it not pretty strong, presumptive evidence, almost indisputable, that he is fit for the rights of citizenship, for he then takes the chances of fighting for this country in the case of war?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not in the least.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am simply stating my recollection, which is somewhat at fault. The gentleman admits that his is slightly at fault, because this bill has been pending so long; but it was a matter of amazement to me to find that owing to some conditions, of which we were not fully informed, a sailor from any foreign country, embarking on a voyage on any American vessels in any foreign port, could, after a service of three years on that vessel, on the certificate of his captain, be admitted to naturalization in the United States—and that upon the simple certificate of the captain that the man had been in the service of the ship. It was after I heard that statement and learned that that condition prevailed, and that anyone from any foreign country, by the mere accident of service on an American ship, could, upon such an uncertain certificate presented to a court, become a citizen after three years of service on a ship that I agreed with the committee that there should be passed a bill which would give some aid to the foreigner who enlists in the service of the United States in the Army or in the Navy.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, has not the gentleman——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. O Mr. Speaker, I shall have to insist that I have the floor.

Mr. HAMILL. Let me ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand we have simply made it easier for men in the Army and Navy to become naturalized.

Mr. HAMILL. Have we not made it more difficult for a man in the Army?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; we have made it easier.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; the gentleman from New Jersey is correct. We have made it more difficult for an honorably discharged soldier to become naturalized.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina for a question.

Mr. FINLEY. Is there anything in this bill that enlarges the limitations as to race for those seeking or entitled to naturalization?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; there is no change, except as to what shall be deemed evidence of residence, and as to the length of service required before soldiers, sailors, marines, and seamen may become naturalized.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any change made with reference to the proof of good moral character?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think that has been strengthened. I shall have to refresh my recollection as to that.

Mr. FOWLER. The proof of good moral character is required now, and if this bill does not pass it will be required in every one of the instances to which this bill deals. Is not that the fact?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I refer the gentleman from Massachusetts to lines 14 and 15, on page 2. The gentleman will there find the provision.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes. I read from the bill—and the affidavits of two credible witnesses, citizens of the United States, identifying the applicant as the person named in the certificate presented.

That is to say, the certificate of good conduct and honorable discharge, which is required by line 7 of the bill, and the certificate of such three years' service, must be signed by a commissioned officer. Then line 14 provides that the affidavits of two credible witnesses, and so forth—shall be deemed competent and sufficient proof of the residence and good moral character required by law.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you not think that the discipline in the Navy and in the Army is of such a high and strict character that no man could go through it for three years and be honorably discharged without being of good moral character?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is why I am in favor of the three-year provision. I should not agree with that as to one year's service.

Mr. FOWLER. One more question before I leave the subject: As the law now stands, is there any difference as to the requirements of the proof of good moral character by the United States of men dealt with in this bill?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Why, I think they all now require certificates of good moral character from neighbors. I think one of the witnesses must be a resident of the same State as the applicant, although I am simply stating this from memory. But knowing that it is impracticable for persons on board ship to furnish the evidence now required, we propose by this bill that in lieu thereof they must bring certificates of honorable discharge and good conduct, signed by a commissioned officer under whom they serve. Moreover, they must furnish the certificate of credible witnesses for purposes of identification.

Mr. FOWLER. Not being a member of the committee, I am not sure whether there is a distinction made in the law as it now exists as to the requirements of proof of good moral character concerning the four classes of men dealt with in this bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. There is this difference: That the existing law requires that the petition shall be verified by the affidavits of two credible witnesses, who shall be citizens of the United States and who shall state that they have known the man for a period at least of one year preceding the date of the filing of his petition, and that they each have personal knowledge that the petitioner is of good moral character. In lieu thereof we now propose to accept a certificate of three years' service and good conduct, together with an honorable discharge certificate, signed by a commissioned officer under whom the applicant for naturalization has served, or the affidavit of a master of a merchant vessel, certifying to three years' service and good conduct. Obviously a man might be shifted from one ship to another in the Navy, and it might be impossible to find two citizens who could testify to everything required by the statute.

Mr. FOWLER. You understand that the statute applies to all the aliens serving in the United States?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Distinctly. The naturalization law, I think, recites that persons may be naturalized in such and such a way, and in no other. I take it that that is the difficulty which we are trying to overcome by this bill, although, as I said before, my recollection is not as complete as I could wish. I think that what I have told the gentleman is substantially accurate.

Mr. FOWLER. One of the gentlemen here, in speaking of the service of the man on the American merchant vessel, said that all he had to do was to send in his certificate of service signed by a captain of such vessel.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Under the old law.

Mr. FOWLER. Does that dispense with the proof of good moral character?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; it did under the Revised Statutes, page 2174. He produces his certificate of discharge and good conduct during that time.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURNETT. That is a part of the reason for making this law uniform as to this particular as well as the length of term of service. Now, by reading the various statutes the gentleman will find that different proof along that very line that he inquires about was required of the applicants for naturalization who had been in these different lines of service. Now, briefly, I will call attention to it:

Any alien of the age of 21 years and upward, who has enlisted, or may enlist, in the Armies of the United States, either the Regular or the Volunteer forces, and has been or may be hereafter honorably discharged, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become such; and he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States previous to his application to become such citizen; and the court admitting such alien shall, in addition to such proof of residence and good moral character as now provided by law, be satisfied by competent proof of such person having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States.

Now, that was in the case of honorably discharged soldiers. Now, when we go over to section 174, that my colleague has called attention to, it gives the seaman there the right the soldier did not have. It says:

Every seaman, being a foreigner, who declares his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States in any competent court, and shall have served three years on board of a merchant vessel of the United States subsequent to the date of such declaration, may, on his application to any competent court and the production of his certificate of discharge and good conduct during that time, together with the certificate of his declaration of intention to become a citizen, be admitted a citizen of the United States; and every seaman, being a foreigner, shall, after his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, and after he shall have served such three years, be deemed a citizen of the United States for the purpose of manning and serving on board any merchant vessel of the United States, anything to the contrary in any act of Congress notwithstanding; but such seaman shall, for all purposes of protection as an American citizen, be deemed such after the filing of his declaration of intention to become such citizen.

So that proof, it seems, of good moral character was not required of the seaman that was even of a soldier.

Mr. FOWLER. The proof of good moral character as the law is now is not uniform?

Mr. BURNETT. That is the proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, you seek by this bill not only to make the proof of good moral character uniform but the length of service uniform also?

Mr. BURNETT. Exactly.

Mr. FOWLER. And are these the only two features this bill seeks to modify?

Mr. BURNETT. These are the two features, as I recollect. And I want to call attention to the Army and Navy and Marine Corps:

And the court admitting such aliens shall, in addition to proof of good moral character, be satisfied by competent proof of such person's service in and honorable discharge from the United States Navy or Marine Corps.

So you see, as to the soldiers and those serving in the Navy, there was proof of good moral character required, but as to merchant vessels that was not required.

Mr. MURRAY. Is it not true that you also extend this proviso to those who serve in the volunteer militia of the various States?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Only the volunteer forces of the United States.

Mr. MURRAY. What does that mean?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It means those who serve the United States in the case of war.

Mr. MURRAY. Not the State militia as now organized?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, no. If the gentleman will look at section 2766 of the United States Statutes, he will find——

Mr. MURRAY. Of course, that is not before me as it is before the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It provides for the naturalization of aliens in the Regular and Volunteer forces.

Mr. MURRAY. Under the provisions of the Dick bill, of course, every organization in the State national guard is part of the volunteer forces.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Only when it becomes a volunteer force.

Mr. MURRAY. That was enacted as the result of our service and the service of like men in the Spanish War. The Dick bill was intended to put the country on a military basis. The gentleman knows that the militia are subject now to inspection only by an inspector of the United States, belonging to the United States Inspector General's Department. I would like to know if this provision means to include men in the various State militia organizations?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That certainly was not its intention.

Mr. MURRAY. Well, it is in it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It would have the same effect, I should say, as the language in the existing law. If the gentleman is correct in his premise that by the passage of the Dick bill that which has hitherto been regarded as the militia of the various States has now become the volunteer force of the United States, then he is correct in his conclusion that this bill extends the privilege of a shorter residential requirement to any alien who might enlist in the Massachusetts Militia. But I think the gentleman is incorrect. I can not imagine that such a construction of the law would be correct.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I can only say, upon my reading of the bill, that there was not any question in my mind but that it applied to the militia forces. I suppose my colleague had the point of view entertained by the committee with respect to it. That had not occurred to me when I read that section. I had in mind the fact that it does extend to the militia organization.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. In that particular respect there is no change from the present law. The present law extends this special naturalization privilege to the Regular and Volunteer forces. Now, even if the gentleman is correct, this bill proposes no change in the law as to the Volunteer forces.

Mr. BURNETT. Might it not be, on the idea that the Dick bill was passed since the law we are amending was enacted, and this being an amendment without exempting them, that there might be some force in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY]?

Mr. MURRAY. I do not want to refer to it particularly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman mean that by reenacting the law in regard to the Regular and Volunteer forces, we make its application different from what it would be if we let it alone?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I simply mean to say that in my mind "the volunteer forces" to-day have a very different meaning from what they had in 1898. I simply mean to say that those words, "volunteer forces," may have a very different meaning from what they had when the naturalization act was adopted.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Suppose we do not pass this legislation which I have in my hand?

Mr. MURRAY. Which is the pending legislation?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; which is the pending legislation. Does the law as it stands to-day permit the naturalization within one year of an alien in the Massachusetts militia?

Mr. MURRAY. I can only determine that question for myself, Mr. Speaker, when I find out when that naturalization act was passed with respect to the date of the enactment of the Dick bill. If it was before, I do not believe it does include militiamen. If it was after the passage of the Dick bill, I believe clearly that it does include them. I have in mind the date.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. This is 1906. No; I beg pardon; this is very old.

Mr. MURRAY. The Dick bill was passed in 1904. When was the existing naturalization law passed?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It was passed in 1906, but it did not include the title to which we have been referring.

Mr. MURRAY. That is the way I determine the question for myself.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. This law with regard to the naturalization of soldiers was passed in 1862.

Mr. MURRAY. It seems to me the meaning of "volunteer forces" there is different from what it would be if you reenacted those words.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman says the meaning of the words "volunteer forces" is now different from what it would be if we reenacted those words?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will prepare an amendment, without asking other questions, excluding the militiamen, I shall offer it myself.

Mr. MURRAY. I am not willing to do that, because I would be delighted to see the militiamen included. In every sense they are on the same basis as the regular forces, except continuous service. Under the Dick bill the militiamen are under the orders of the commander in chief of the State they are in, and I think that is a wise provision, and I want to commend the committee for drafting such a resolution. I am not willing to present an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what is pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KINDRED). Amendments to the bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire time?

Mr. MANN. I only wanted to ask a question about the bill. It may duplicate questions that have been already asked, because it has been impossible to hear the conversation that has been taking place over there.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I invite the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that I can not hear him. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that if gentlemen over there would come over here they would be heard.

Mr. KENDALL. Suppose the committee moves over to the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen from Massachusetts should not always be so far apart. They should get together.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. What is the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. I notice the bill provides that an original or a verified copy of such discharge shall be attached to and made a part of the petition. Just what is meant by that?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. What is that conundrum? What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. MANN. Page 2, line 15, in reference to the evidence that is desired. It says that either the original or a verified copy of such discharge shall be attached to and made a part of the petition. Will that be obligatory in every case? Is that what it means?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will tell me what kind of a trap he is trying to lead me into I will answer his question.

Mr. MANN. I am not trying to lead the gentleman into a trap, but I will explain what I have in mind.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is what I want to know.

Mr. MANN. The bill provides that the petition may be filed either before or after the discharge from the Government service. It may also be filed either before or after discharge from the merchant-marine service. In the first case there is an honorable discharge, and in the other case there may be a certificate of the master. Apparently the bill would require either a copy of the original discharge or the original itself to be filed with every petition, although there may have been no discharge, as in the case of surgeons on merchant vessels, where there is no discharge, but only a certificate to be filed.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but if he will turn to line 16, page 2, would the gentleman's difficulty be cured if the words "or certificate as aforesaid" are inserted after the word "discharge"?

Mr. MANN. It would if there is a discharge at all, but this petition may be filed before the sailor is discharged. At the top of page 2 the gentleman will see it says:

> After three years of such service, while still in the service, or within six months after an honorable discharge therefrom.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman is correct. That must be remedied in some way.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman, then, that if he will add after the word "discharge" the words "or certificate, if any," that would probably cover the case.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Insert the words "certificate, if any."

Mr. MANN. "Discharge, if any." I would put "certificate" before "discharge."

Mr. BURNETT. After the word "such."

Mr. MANN. So that it will read:

> Copy of such certificate or discharge, if any.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is perfectly correct.

Mr. MURRAY. If the gentleman has concluded, may I ask him to withhold his motion for the previous question until after I have opportunity to move an amendment?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman for debate, not for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MURRAY. I should like to be recognized, so that I can offer an amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I propose to offer an amendment myself. How much time does the gentleman want for debate?

Mr. MURRAY. Five or ten minutes will do for debate.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not want to yield the floor.

Mr. MURRAY. I am not asking the gentleman to do that.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am going to move the previous question, in accordance with the custom of the House.

Mr. MURRAY. If the gentleman will allow me to offer this amendment I think it may save time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman can take his own course about that.

Mr. MURRAY. Before the House votes on the previous question, I should like to offer my amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman can read it in his time. I yield to my colleague five minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I have tried to arrange with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that he withhold his motion for the previous question, in order that I might move to amend by adding a new section to the measure that will bring clearly before the House at this time the matter of affirming or withholding affirmation from the present naturalization laws. I have sent to the Clerk's desk, in order that it might be presented to the House, a proposed amendment, which I will now read:

Seventh. That any alien of the age of 21 years and upward, who has lived continuously for five years in the United States of America, has declared his intention to forswear allegiance to any king, queen, prince, or foreign potentate, and to become a citizen of the United States of America, and has satisfied the judge of any court authorized to grant citizenship that the applicant alien is of sound mind and of healthy body, may petition for naturalization in any court authorized to grant citizenship; and the petition of any such alien shall be docketed and final hearing had thereon by the court immediately, or at the convenience of the court, and within 90 days.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of that amendment is to get away from some of the conditions which, to my mind, are entire hardships in the matter of the administration of the present naturalization laws. My first question to the gentleman from Massachusets, my colleague [Mr. GARDNER], when I succeeded in obtaining recognition was to ask him to state directly what are the present requirements of the naturalization laws. That statement has not been made to the House, and the reason why the gentleman is withholding a statement of the present requirements of the naturalization laws is known to him, but is not known to me. It may be that it is because even he recognizes that those requirements are harsh, indeed, for any man who is of the right sort and the right material to become a valued citizen of our country.

The conditions not only require five years of actual residence and the filing of the request for first papers at a time several months in advance of the granting of the final papers, but they also require that no certificate of citizenship, regardless of the length of residence of the alien, regardless of the time that may have elapsed since the first papers were applied for, shall be issued to any alien within 90 days of his application or 30 days of a general election.

Mr. Speaker, I insist that that requirement of the naturalization laws is a hardship so great that it has deterred many desirable men from making final application. The matter of voting at an election is not uppermost in the mind of the average man during most of the days of the year. Men do not begin to think of matters pertaining to election until the elections are upon us. Many applications are not made, therefore, until just before an election or a primary that may cause general interest in the matter of the right to vote. I say that provision of application before an election is a hardship that ought not to be continued, and I say that it has done more to keep desirable aliens from making application for citizenship than any other single feature of the naturalization laws.

Mr. Speaker, my proposed amendment requires certain things as the test of the question whether a man shall have final citizenship papers granted to him or not. It requires first five years of continuous residence in the country—not a year of residence and a year of departure to other countries, as has been frequently done under the system that is even now in vogue, but five years continuous residence—in order that we may be sure that the applicant is one who values residence as he will value citizenship in this country of ours.

It requires, too, that the alien shall forswear allegiance to any foreign king, queen, prince, or potentate, which ought to be an early step in the progress toward citizenship. It requires, too, the clear determination or intention that is firmly fixed in the mind of the applicant, that he desires to become a citizen of this country, that he may boast with pride of his American citizenship as men in early days used to boast of the citizenship that was theirs. It requires that he must satisfy the judge of the court to whom his application is addressed that he is of sound mind and healthy body.

I think it is a shocking scandal for agents of the Bureau of Naturalization to require men to pass civil-service examinations in some instances before they may be permitted to receive their final citizenship papers. My words are a feeble protest against that system, and the purpose of this amendment is to force a vote, if I may do so, at this time upon that matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is a suitable time to introduce an amendment changing the whole naturalization law without its being thoroughly considered by the committee.

Mr. MURRAY. Does the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. May I inquire what opportunity has been afforded to get a hearing before the committee on similar propositions?

Mr. BURNETT. Has the gentleman ever asked for a hearing?

Mr. MURRAY. No; but many of my colleagues have.

Mr. BURNETT. None have been refused.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is doing an injustice to the chairman of the committee and the members of the committee. I know of no such case.

Mr. MURRAY. Does the gentleman know of any bill now pending before this House which has been referred to his committee, to lessen the requirements of the naturalization laws of the United States?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. We have a very long list of bills. I can not answer that question directly.

Mr. MURRAY. The thing that deterred me from introducing this bill and having it referred to the committee was a clear understanding that the point of view of the majority of the Democratic members and the majority of the Republican members of the committee was that this matter ought not to get into the subjects under consideration. I have informally discussed it with members of the committee. I have informally discussed it with my own colleague, Mr. CURLEY, a member of the committee. He is not here at this time, but I have understood from him and others that the committee was so busy with the Dillingham bill and the Burnett bill and other matters affecting the immigration laws that they were not willing to consider any proposed changes in the naturalization laws of the United States. It is a matter of surprise, indeed, to me to find even this bill to amend the naturalization laws, and I am taking advantage of the first opportunity that I reasonably believe I have to cause this amendment to be considered.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 11 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether or not he is of the opinion that these high fees which are now paid by the applicant for citizenship should be remitted in these cases. At the present time every applicant is compelled to pay a fee of $5. I am of the opinion that after a man has served his country for five years in the Army or the Navy and is desirous to become naturalized it is unfair for us to impose this high fee upon him. I believe we can easily remit the fees of such applicants—men who have served their new adopted country faithfully for three or five years and have been honorably discharged.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is a member of the committee. He knows that we never considered that proposition; at least, I do not remember that the committee considered it. I think it ought to have been brought to the attention of the committee for the committee to consider, and find out what the reasons were in favor or against the high fees. The gentleman from Illinois voted for reporting the bill as it stands.

Mr. SABATH. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, I did vote to report the bill, but I believe some consideration should be shown to these men who have faithfully and honestly served our country. It, however, did not occur to me while the bill was being considered in the committee, but it does occur to me now; and for that reason I thought that I might call the attention of the House to it and also call it to the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and inquire of him whether he would not be in favor now of accepting such an amendment, as it never is too late to do right.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman realizes perfectly well the situation which obtains here to-day. Some bills came up unexpectedly where the work had to be divided, where the committee was not as thoroughly prepared as it would like to have been, and the situation is such and I am acting in such a capacity that I am bound, no matter what my own views might be on remitting the dues, to insist on protecting the committee I happen to be representing at the present instance and insist that such questions should be reserved for the committee's prior consideration.

Mr. SABATH. I notice the chairman of the committee who is responsible for this measure sitting right close by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It would not take more than a minute to consult with him, and the chances are that he will agree to such an amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will pardon me, I will state that instead of reducing the fees I have been all the time in favor of increasing them. The fees are now so low that the clerks in the courts in the interior, where they have little of this business to do, have refused to take naturalization cases and have the papers on hand for the courts to pass upon. In my own town the clerks in our own courts have returned the papers. You can not force a State court to do it, and men are forced to go to Birmingham or somewhere else for the purpose of reaching a Federal court at great expense, because the fees are so insignificant that the clerks in the interior will not take them.

Now, we are making concessions to these men; we are making concessions that are not made to the German farmer that comes into the country for the purpose of making it a home, and why should we make any more concessions, cut off this measly fee of $5, to these men when we do not do it to men who come to make their homes among us? Why should we do it for these men when we are not doing it for others? I am for higher fees straight out.

Mr. SABATH. I mean to eliminate the fees only for those who have served the country in the Army and Navy. They surely can not be bad or objectionable people, and for that reason we should make it easier for them to become American citizens.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to offer, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, strike out the word "discharge" and insert the words "certificate or discharge, if any."

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILL. What change does that make in the law?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The law as we propose it says that the certificate or discharge must be attached to the petition; but we have provided also in the law that a man may make a petition before he gets his discharge, so that it might be possible that there would be no discharge.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MURRAY) there were 43 ayes and 8 noes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. All those in favor of ordering the previous question will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and those who are opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 208, nays 10, answered "present" 8, not voting 157, as follows:

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SCULLY, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. BROWNING was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and be recorded "present."

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

When the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department was called:

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department instructed me to call up a bill, but after conference with certain members of said committee I think I shall ask unanimous consent to occupy about five minutes of time in making a statement in relation to it and not call up the bill at this time. I do this because there are so many bills of vital importance which ought to be passed before March 4 next that we feel, under the circumstances, we ought not to take up the time of the House now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was instructed to call up the bill (H. R. 21224) to amend section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The purpose of this bill was to restrict expenditures of a certain fund appropriated each year for use in the State Department, known as the diplomatic or consular fund, commonly known as the "secret fund." The Members of the House are familiar with the fact that our committee held extended hearings some months ago in relation to the expenditures of moneys by the State Department, and found what we thought to be a very great abuse in the expenditures of that department, especially in the expenditure of the so-called "secret fund." As a result of that fact the committee reported a bill here providing for the creation of a joint committee, composed of three Members of the House, with three Members of the Senate, to which committee the President and Secretary of State should report each year by an itemized statement the expenditures out of this secret fund. Then that committee would determine what portion, if any, of this expenditure should be made public, and what portion, if any, should not be made public. The only purpose of this committee was to prevent the useless, reckless, and unlawful use of that fund by the State Department. Before the close of the hearings, however, we felt that the purpose we intended to bring about had been accomplished, as evidenced by the statement of the present Secretary of State. We called upon him for the production of certain vouchers which showed the expenditure of money covered in settlement with the Treasury under section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. After refusing for some time to produce those vouchers, he finally did so, and made this statement in answer to the following question by the chairman:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I certainly congratulate you upon getting around to our view of this matter.

Secretary KNOX. I had not the slightest hesitation in getting there when I got started.

The CHAIRMAN. We have certainly done some good if we have convinced you that these expenditures should not have been covered by secret certificates under section 291.

Secretary KNOX. There was no excuse for it whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not hesitate to say, speaking for myself, that it was not so much this particular item as it was the principle of the thing for which I have been contending. We felt that you had a practice in the State Department of covering in settlement with the Treasury expenditures out of appropriations that ought not to be covered by certificates under section 291, and it was for the purpose of settling the question as to whether you could legally do that that you have been called upon to produce these vouchers.

Secretary KNOX. As I said to you the other day, it became evident to me that there had been loose practice in the department in regard to the authority conferred by section 291, and for that reason—and I think it is due to you to say that the investigations by this committee directed my attention to the subject—I issued the order that I told you about the other day, a copy of which I will furnish you.

The copy of the order is as follows, and I will ask permission to incorporate in the statement I am making a copy of those orders:

[No. 32.]

REGULATIONS GOVERNING EXPENDITURES FROM THE APPROPRIATION FOR "UNFORESEEN EMERGENCIES ARISING IN THE DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE, AND TO EXTEND THE COMMERCIAL AND OTHER INTERESTS OF THE UNITED STATES."

1. Expenditures from the appropriation for emergencies will be made solely upon written authorizations signed by the President or by the Secretary of State, or, in his absence, by the Acting Secretary of State, in all cases prior to the making of an expenditure or the issuing of any instruction placing a charge upon the appropriation.

2. All authorizations when submitted for signature shall set forth, except as hereinafter ordered to the contrary, (1) the purpose of the expenditure; (2) the rate of compensation if for services; (3) the period of employment or expenditure, if for a fixed term, or, when not definitely known, the approximate term; (4) the total charge to be made against the appropriation, if it can be ascertained, and if not, an approximate estimate; (5) the available balance of the appropriation at the time of authorization (the balance to be inserted in the authorization by the Chief of the Bureau of Accounts over his initials prior to the signing of the authorization by the Secretary of State).

3. Persons traveling or on special detail in connection with the objects of the appropriation, whose accounts are payable from the appropriation, shall receive reimbursement for actual, reasonable, and necessary expenses in addition to their regular compensation provided by law or regulation. Persons not in the employ of the Government may be given a stipulated rate of compensation and actual and necessary expenses, or a per diem in lieu of compensation and expenses according to the direction of the President or the Secretary of State in each case. A per diem allowance for expenses in addition to salary provided by law is prohibited. A copy of the appointment, designation, or contract in each case must be annexed to the account when submitted for approval.

4. The disbursement of moneys from the appropriation shall ordinarily be made by check, but cash payment may be made in those cases authorized by Treasury Regulations when the payment is made by the disbursing officer in person or by his deputy and the exchange of money and the receipt therefor is simultaneous.

5. When for any reason the President or the Secretary of State may deem it inexpedient in the public interest to make known the purpose or manner of a proposed expenditure from the appropriation, the authorization will be so drawn for the amount stipulated and the money will be paid over to the President or the Secretary of State upon the execution of a receipt therefor, which shall be filed as a voucher.

6. When presented for approval, all accounts for moneys chargeable to the appropriation shall have attached thereto the authorization in each case, and shall be itemized and supported by vouchers according to the usual practice required by law and the regulations of the Comptroller of the Treasury, except in cases where from the nature and method of the expenditure it is impracticable or inexpedient in the public interest to do so, and in such cases the personal certificate of the person expending the money may be accepted in lieu of vouchers in support of the account, when approved by the Secretary of State.

7. All accounts for moneys payable from the appropriation for emergencies that are not of a confidential nature shall be settled with the accounting officers of the Treasury by submitting the original paid vouchers in the same manner as expenditures from other appropriations, but such as may be considered confidential will be settled upon a certificate signed by the Secretary of State, or in his absence by the Acting Secretary of State, under section 291 of the Revised Statutes.

8. All authorizations, accounts, and certificates relating to the aforesaid appropriation will be presented for the signature of the Secretary or Acting Secretary of State through the Director of the Consular Service or such other officer as shall have been designated by the Secretary of State to supervise the finances of the department.

9. The authorizations given shall be numbered and filed numerically by the Bureau of Accounts and separate from the paid voucher, the number and date of each authorization being noted upon the account to which it relates.

10. All correspondence in relation to expenditures from the appropriation for emergencies shall be signed by the Secretary of State, or in his absence by the Acting Secretary of State.

These regulations will become effective on and after June 15, 1911.

P. C. KNOX.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 1, 1911.

[No. 31.]

It is hereby ordered that from this date and until otherwise directed the general administrative departmental supervision of all financial matters affecting the foreign-service establishment shall be in charge of the Director of the Consular Service, acting under the general direction of the department.

The formal signature and approval required by law to be by Assistant Secretaries will continue as now allotted. The administrative direction and responsibility in all financial matters affecting the Departmental, Diplomatic, and Consular Services will continue, under the administrative direction and supervision of the chief clerk, the Third Assistant Secretary, and the Director of the Consular Service, respectively, as at present.

The Third Assistant Secretary of State and the Director of the Consular Service will require, respectively, from the Chiefs of the Diplomatic and Consular Bureaus, as well as from other departmental officers concerned, the most painstaking and methodical assistance. The chief clerk will make similar requirement of all departmental officers concerned, and including especially those in charge of the stationery room, mail room, stables, etc., and those concerned in the purchase or handling of departmental supplies. The chief clerk will also take all steps to introduce labor-saving methods in the department, and to make sure day by day that the clerical force is so distributed as to accomplish the maximum amount of work.

In this connection the chief clerk will proceed at once to collect and submit to the general direction of the department the absolutely accurate efficiency reports upon department personnel contemplated by the Executive order of November 26, 1909.

The Bureau of Accounts will report directly to the Director of the Consular Service in addition to conferring with the Third Assistant Secretary and the chief clerk. No class of correspondence will be carried on by the Bureau of Accounts except as specifically authorized by the Director of the Consular Service, the Bureau of Accounts limiting its activities to the actual processes of accounting, verification, disbursement, estimates, etc.

Every item of proposed expenditures must be passed upon by the bureau, division, or office within the sphere of the work of which the object of the expenditure falls. It must also be passed upon by the Diplomatic Bureau, the Consular Bureau, or the chief clerk, according to the branch of the service affected. It must also be passed upon by the Third Assistant Secretary if diplomatic, and if consular by the Director of the Consular Service, who also in all doubtful cases will always consult the comptroller and when desirable the solicitor, who will familiarize himself with the laws bearing upon the financial affairs of the department. In case of any particularly important or unusual item, the general direction of the department will also be consulted before final authorization is given. With the exception of signatures required by law, the fact of approval may be indicated by the initials of the officer so approving.

The same officers will be responsible for the determination of the fact that the department got value received for the expenditure made, the Bureau of Accounts being responsible for such questions as those of availability of funds and the correctness of the whole process. These rules shall be rigidly applied to all expenditures.

To enable the Director of the Consular Service to assume this additional responsibility, he is hereby authorized so to strengthen the Consular Bureau, by transfers or otherwise, as to enable that bureau to relieve him of such amount of the detail of consular work as will leave him only what is appropriate and necessary for the attention of the administrative officer directing that service.

P. C. KNOX.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 20, 1911.

[No. 34.]

The Third Assistant Secretary and the chief clerk of the department are hereby designated to make, semiannually, an examination of all expenditures made by the Chief of the Bureau of Accounts and disbursing clerk other than those subject to the examination and audit of the accounting officers of the Treasury. Particular attention is to be directed to all expenditures covered by certificate in pursuance of section 291 of the Revised Statutes. The examination will take place during the months of July and January and will include an inspection of all vouchers, account books, and other evidences of expenditures of money, and the proper checking of those vouchers against the accounts of the various appropriations, and of the accounts of the Chief of the Bureau of Accounts and disbursing clerk. Upon the completion of each examination a written report will be made to the Secretary of State showing the condition of the accounts and pointing out any irregularities that may be found to exist or any improvements in methods that may be thought to be desirable.

This order shall be in effect on and after July 1, 1911.

P. C. KNOX.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 1, 1911.

Afterwards he made this statement:

Secretary KNOX. Under the operation of that order no vouchers are passed under section 291 unless they are brought to me in a separate envelope printed on the back in legible type, "These vouchers are for the personal inspection of the Secretary of State," for the purpose of considering whether they are proper to be passed under section 291; they are not brought to me with the mail, and the chief clerk is directed to deliver them to my private secretary with instructions that these are vouchers proposed to be passed under section 291 and are to be handed to me personally, so that I am trying to do everything in my power, at least, to see that proper practice is followed.

The CHAIRMAN. I am very much obliged to you for that statement, and I will say, furthermore, that I am sure it is not the purpose of this committee to try to get hold of information that we ought not to have; but we had reached the conclusion—some of us at least—as I said a while ago, that the practice in the State Department had been such that many dollars of the public money was being expended and information in regard to the expenditures denied to Congress and to the public that ought not to be denied to the public. I feel, of course, that Congress being the body that appropriates the money, it is entitled to all the information as to how it is expended, and that if there is anything that ought to be kept secret we can keep it as well as anybody else.

In view of that statement, Mr. Speaker, the committee has felt that the only purpose that we had in view has perhaps been accomplished. We have no pride of authorship in any bill which we report here but only to prohibit the misuse of this money. If our efforts have been successful in calling the attention of the present Secretary of State to the fact, and he has finally consented to correct this evil, we express the hope and belief that the next Secretary of State will follow along the same lines and throw around the expenditure of this money all the safeguards necessary, in order that the money may not be misused. Then we will have accomplished our purpose and will therefore have no desire to impose upon the House the consideration of this bill at this time.

That is all I care to say. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. For what did the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] ask unanimous consent?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to insert some copies of orders of the Secretary of State, which I did not read, in my remarks. I will ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting some documents.

The SPEAKER. What was the gentleman's request which he submitted a moment ago?

Mr. HAMLIN. That the bill be passed by now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent——

Mr. HAMLIN. I did not ask unanimous consent to pass our committee. I said that we would not avail ourselves of the opportunity of calling up the bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Missouri extending his remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. HENRY of Texas (when the Committee on Rules was called). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to pass the Committee on Rules without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, it seems to me a strange request to come from the Committee on Rules, which at any time can bring in a rule to make anything in order. Why does the gentleman desire to have the Committee on Rules passed?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There are one or two little matters that are not privileged but that are on the calendar, and I would like to call them up from the calendar.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing on the calendar reported from the Committee on Rules which has not been there for a long time, and the gentleman knows that we are approaching the end of Calendar Wednesday so far as this session of Congress is concerned. I think we ought to understand in the House what may possibly come up. If you pass over a committee without knowing what may be called up from that committee the House can have no conception of what may come before it.

What is the gentleman's purpose? Let us be frank in regard to it. There is only one thing on the calendar reported from the Committee on Rules, and the gentleman can state what his objection is in regard to that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There are several matters on the calendar from the Committee on Rules. I do not know that the committee will call up anything, but this is one time that the committee would like to be passed over for a while.

Mr. MANN. There are two propositions reported from the Committee on Rules. One is a good-roads proposition, introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], which was incorporated in the Post Office appropriation bill last summer, and, I take it, is not likely to be called up again. The other is the Monticello proposition, in which Members of the House are interested, and I think we ought to know whether the gentleman intends to call that up or not.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I will state that I am not ready to say whether I will or not. I may, and I may not. I have not made up my mind that I shall call it up. But the good-roads proposition is on the calendar, and there are one or two incidental matters that may be hooked onto that that would be of interest to the House.

Mr. MANN. The good-roads proposition is to create a commission, and that commission has already been created by law.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It is on the calendar yet, and we have the right to dispose of it. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object. I do not know that I shall bring up anything, but I simply request that we pass this committee over.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to object to the request of the gentleman from Texas, but in view of the fact that his committee can at any time bring in a rule for the consideration of measures, I will ask him to break up the practice of passing over committees. If we commence to do that we are lost.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Very well.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman what is meant by passing a committee without prejudice?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I suppose that it means that we can take it up on the next Calendar Wednesday as unfinished business.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is there any precedent for that, and would not the gentleman have to take his chance if the committee is simply passed over without prejudice?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We could take our chance and go back as soon as the irrigation bill is considered.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is technical. I doubt very much if the passing of the committee without prejudice would entitle that committee to the privilege of calling up a bill on the next Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that would be the understanding.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my colleague a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask if that is his interpretation of the rule and if he is reasonably confident of that fact, if the committee were now passed, that he would come in at the conclusion of the unfinished business on the following Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that would be the construction, that the House could afford to take up the business of that committee when the unfinished business is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] desire to call up anything of his committee?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I pass now.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objected to passing.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not care to call up anything from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland (when the Committee on the Library was called). I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 67.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is recognized.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ARTS AND LETTERS.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill 18505, House Calendar No. 351, incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18505) incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

Be it enacted, etc., That William Dean Howells, of New York; Henry James, of Massachusetts; Henry Adams, of the District of Columbia; Thomas Raynesford Lounsbury, of Connecticut; Theodore Roosevelt, of New York; John Singer Sargent, of Massachusetts; Horace Howard Furness, of Pennsylvania; Alfred Thayer Mahan, of New York; Daniel Chester French, of New York; John Burroughs, of New York; James Ford Rhodes, of Massachusetts; Horatio William Parker, of Connecticut; William Milligan Sloane, of New York; Robert Underwood Johnson, of New York; George Washington Cable, of Massachusetts; Andrew Dickson White, of New York; Henry van Dyke, of New Jersey; William Crary Brownell, of New York; Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve, of Maryland; Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey; Arthur Twining Hadley, of Connecticut; HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts; Francis Hopkinson Smith, of New York; Edwin Howland Blashfield, of New York; William Merritt Chase, of New York; Thomas Hastings, of New York; Hamilton Wright Mable, of New Jersey; Brander Matthews, of New York; Thomas Nelson Page, of the District of Columbia; Elihu Vedder, of Massachusetts; George Edward Woodberry, of Massachusetts; Kenyon Cox, of New York; George Whitefield Chadwick, of Massachusetts; Abbott Handerson Thayer, of New Hampshire; John Muir, of California; Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts; Henry Mills Alden, of New Jersey; George de Forest Brush, of New Hampshire; William Rutherford Mead, of New York; John White Alexander, of New York; Bliss Perry, of Massachusetts; Francis Davis Millet, of New York; Abbott Lawrence Lowell, of Massachusetts; James Whitcomb Riley, of Indiana; Nicholas Murray Butler, of New York; Paul Wayland Bartlett, of New York; George Browne Post, of New York, and their successors, duly chosen, are hereby incorporated, constituted, and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia, by the name of the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

SEC. 2. That the purposes of this corporation are and shall be the furtherance of the interests of literature and the fine arts.

SEC. 3. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters shall consist of not more than 50 regular members, and the said corporation hereby constituted shall have power to make by-laws and rules and regulations; to fill all vacancies created by death, resignation, or otherwise; to provide for the election of foreign, domestic, or honorary associate members, and the division of such members into classes, and to do all other matters needful or usual in such institutions.

SEC. 4. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters shall hold an annual meeting at such place in the United States as may be designated and shall make an annual report to the Congress, to be filed with the Librarian of Congress.

SEC. 5. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to receive bequests and donations of real or personal property and to hold the same in trust, and to invest and reinvest the same for the purpose of furthering the interests of literature and the fine arts.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for an hour.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to take the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] off the floor. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to the time, but the gentleman from Georgia can go ahead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] undoubtedly would have been entitled to the time, but the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] rose and the gentleman from Texas did not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my time, and yield the floor to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the balance of my time, and yield to the gentleman from Texas. I do not desire to take the floor in advance against the gentleman. I only took the floor because the Speaker was about to put the question.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] yields the floor and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] takes the floor, can the gentleman from Georgia reserve the right to take the floor again? I simply want to ask the question as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Whoever has the floor in his own right can move the previous question.

Mr. GARNER. That is what I thought.

The SPEAKER. What was the remark of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I said whoever yields the floor in his own right can move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. But suppose he does not want to move the previous question?

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman from Georgia would be entitled to his time.

Mr. GARNER. This was the parliamentary inquiry that I asked in the endeavor to get from the Chair a ruling on this point: If the gentleman from Georgia reserves the balance of his time and yields the floor to the gentleman from Texas, and if the gentleman from Texas, in his own time, sees proper to move the previous question, would he not cut off the time of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MANN. He would if it was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly. If the House sustained the demand, that is what would happen.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The gentleman from Georgia having been recognized, is he not entitled to an hour?

The SPEAKER. Answering the gentleman from Maryland, it is the uniform practice of the House for the Chairman or the Speaker, or whoever happens to be presiding, to recognize the gentleman that is in charge of the bill, and he is recognized for an hour if he shows any disposition to take it. If he uses up his hour and does not move the previous question, another gentleman is recognized, and so on, to the end of the chapter. But the Member who is managing the bill, or anybody else who has the floor, can move the previous question, and if the House orders the previous question, that is the end of it.

Now, no one rose, and the Chair started to put the question as to the engrossment and third reading of the bill. After the Chair started to put that question the gentleman from Georgia rose and was undoubtedly entitled to the floor. If the gentleman from Georgia yields the floor and the gentleman from Texas takes the floor in his own right, whenever he gets ready he can move the previous question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I was in the observance of the rights of a Member of the House when I rose and stated that I was opposed to the bill. At that time nobody suggested that he desired to take the floor in advocacy of the bill, but I desired to present some reasons for not supporting it. Now, out of courtesy, I desire to yield the floor, and, if the previous question is not ordered, could not the Chair recognize me again?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Texas takes his seat without moving the previous question, the Chair will recognize the first gentleman who wants recognition.

Mr. KENDALL. But the gentleman from Georgia would have no prior right over anybody else.

The SPEAKER. No; but the Chair might see him a little more quickly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I shall have to make a brief statement to make my inquiry clear. I called up this resolution and expected to make a brief statement about it, and then turn it over to my colleague on the committee, Mr. TOWNSEND. Just at that moment there was so much confusion that I could not hear what was going on, and by an accident my papers were knocked off the desk, and while I was endeavoring to recover the papers the Speaker, properly assuming that I had nothing to say about it, took it for granted I did not intend to offer any explanation and started to put the question as to the engrossment and third reading of the bill. I did intend to avail myself of the right to an hour, for the purpose of giving the gentleman from New Jersey an opportunity to make an explanation. If I had the floor I certainly would not move the previous question and shut off my friend, the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I yield the floor.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, this bill was so recently reported that I assume that Members have had little opportunity to read the report submitted by the committee. It is brief, and I shall take the liberty of reading it first because it makes a very clear exposition of why these gentlemen have come to Congress for this purpose. This bill, I may say, is supplementary to another bill already passed the House to incorporate the institute.

The report is as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to incorporate a distinguished body of authors, artists, and composers of music analagous to the National Academy of Sciences, which received a national charter in 1863. It may fairly be said to occupy the same relative position toward literature and the arts which the latter organization has always occupied toward science.

The object of the academy is to stimulate the production of good professional work by upholding the best standards and giving recognition to excellence.

It is neither the purpose nor desire to obtain financial aid from the Government, but merely to enable the organization to receive and expend any fund which, for the purpose of advancing literature and the arts, may be intrusted to its good faith, its experience, and its knowledge of the best use to which such fund may be put.

In the constitution of the academy there is no sectional, partisan, social, or other bias. The members are men of national reputation in their several activities. They are chosen, as vacancies occur, from the membership of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, by which the academy was established in 1905, and which, in turn, was organized in 1898 by the American Social Science Association.

The academy has no commercial purpose in view, and the granting of the charter will prove an encouragement and a stimulus to literature and the arts. The committee is unanimously of the opinion that the charter should be granted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Members took notice during the reading of the bill of the names of the 50 gentlemen and their locality, they, of course, saw, without any argument, that they are the names of 50 men, distinguished gentlemen in arts, and letters, and composition of music in the United States. While it has never been the business of these gentlemen to favor any section, they have been very fortunate in finding men and women whose excellence either in art or letters or musical composition entitles them to be classed with these 50; there is scarcely a section of the country that is not represented by some literary or artistic person in this list.

These gentlemen are asking only what has been done by Congress for the scientific bodies of this country, and if this body is incorporated it will be to literature, arts, and music what the incorporated scientific body is to science, and no one with any interest in such matters but can have observed how greatly science has been encouraged by the promotion of this scientific body in giving encouragement to the young and eager workers in science. Just exactly such encouragement will be given to the workers in arts and letters by the measure we present here to-day.

Mr. Speaker, it is undoubtedly true, I think, as has been stated here, that the United States is the only country with any profession whatever for a love of or encouragement of literature and art that has not an incorporated body such as is here designed. Perhaps Members are most familiar with that incorporated in France, which has done for the literature of France immeasurable good. Undoubtedly this body could do a great deal of good, because those who work in this profession, perhaps, are the only ones who really recognize how much assistance it is to the young author to have his work recognized by the masters of his profession, men that he looks up to as able critics. Encouragement and other help will be given by this body to establish some definite basis of what constitutes that rather peculiar quality, style in work. Of course we have produced within the past 20 years numerous best sellers, but I think it will be the judgment of anyone here who has taken the pains to read the best sellers that some of them lack very largely in the best qualities of literature. Doubtless that is true in sculpture and the graphic arts and music, but with them I am not so familiar.

It seems to me that there is no good excuse to be argued against the desire of these gentlemen to encourage that which we so much admire. There was a great school of New England literature that has now almost died out. Possibly the encouragement of arts and literature by this body may re-create that school, and it may re-create it in some unlooked for portion of the United States. Young musicians, sculptors, and painters are not necessarily a product of the oldest cities. They may arise unexpectedly in places far removed from what we are accustomed to call the centers of literature and art, and it will be the effort of this body of gentlemen to encourage evidences of art progress wherever it may be discovered.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I notice you say in the bill that this is declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why is it necessary that Congress should grant a charter to these men? Has not the District of Columbia a code of laws which provide for the incorporation or chartering of persons like these? And why should Congress be called upon to grant a charter of this kind?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, if what I have said has suggested to any gentleman here that this is a desirable incorporation, of course it follows, as a matter of course, that the greater the prestige given to this body the more useful its work will be, and I frankly confess that that is the greatest good this bill will do. It will give to this body a prestige which will be reflected in its criticism of the work which naturally it will consider.

Now, that is not a substantial fact. It is nothing which can be weighed or measured, if you please, but it is something nevertheless quite important. If these gentlemen have this very great prestige of being a national body, the encouragement and help which they give to those who are struggling in arts or letters will be just that much more weighty.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand the bill it provides that vacancies are to be filled by the choice made by those who remain. Am I correct in that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. So that one object and purpose of the bill is to recognize distinction in the arts or in literature.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should say that that is so.

Mr. TOWNER. So that an election to this body will be considered in the future as a recognition of excellence in literature or in the arts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman will remember that when Pierre Loti was elected to the French Academy it was considered that for the first time those competent to judge of literature in France had placed the seal of their approval on his works; and to carry the analogy here, with the possibility of this reward before men engaged in these professions, they certainly would take greater pains, would strive harder and more earnestly to accomplish good work, because they would desire this recognition, which in its way would be the highest recognition they could gain.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course, an election to the French Academy is a recognition of merit and distinction that is known and goes all over the world. That is one of the objects and purposes of this incorporation. There is another, as I understand it, and that is for the purpose of encouraging the arts and literature and of establishing standards in art and literature in this country. That is really the double purpose that this association will have.

Mr. TOWNSEND. First, if you please, you establish a body which is by general consent the highest authority of criticism upon these classes of work. Then their approval of work naturally follows, and I think that no one will cavil at the statement that the approval by this body of any work done does place the stamp of excellence upon that work, an approval which now has no means of such expression.

Mr. TOWNER. I am exceedingly anxious that this bill should pass and only wanted to make these observations in order that the Members of the House might understand the proper purpose of it.

Mr. GARNER. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to section 5 in reference to the right of this corporation to own real and personal property, to inquire whether or not they could own it in any State of the Union; and if so, whether it would be subject to taxation, and so forth? If the gentleman has not reached that subject, I am perfectly willing to have him postpone the answer to my inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not prepared to answer that question. I think the chairman of the committee is competent to answer it.

Mr. GARNER. I think that is quite an important inquiry, because we want to know whether or not this company can own real estate in Texas, and if so, how much and how long, and whether or not it would have to pay taxes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the gentleman will withhold his question until the chairman of the committee has an opportunity to answer it.

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should like to ask how these particular men were chosen to be the incorporators of the academy?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They were chosen from the national institute.

Mr. SHERLEY. How was that created?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I presume that was an accretion, a growth, from a meeting of people interested in arts and letters in the various cities, and upon occasion they got together, and the value of instituting some such body naturally suggested itself, just as there is a national body for automobiles, baseball, advertising, and so forth.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the gentleman correctly, then, and if my own impressions, formed prior to the gentleman's statement, are correct, these gentlemen have associated themselves together, and under their self-perpetuating organization propose to determine hereafter who shall be among the elect in art and letters.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can imagine no better jury to determine who shall number among the 50 foremost men in arts and letters than such a jury as it is here purposed to establish for that purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think perhaps a determination in the first instance by some one other than those who are to exercise the power might be better, in order to get an impartial judgment. But, waiving that, I should like to ask the gentleman this question, following what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] suggests: Does the gentleman believe that the Federal Government should be asked to charter this association, in order to give it a better standing in arts and literature, and is it not the better rule that a voluntary association of self-elected judges of art or letters should have their prestige rest upon their deserved ability, and not upon the gift of the Government, to afford them prestige by a national incorporation?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that these gentlemen are incapable of giving to themselves, by anything which they may do, any prestige which would make them a more helpful body as critics. That prestige must come from an outside source, and certainly the highest source that such prestige can be given to them is from the Congress of the United States. Possibly these gentlemen entertain an opinion, which I share, that they do constitute a jury of the highest qualifications, but they can not proclaim that fact, and if they did proclaim it it would not put the stamp of prestige upon them.

If Congress, by incorporating them as a national body for the purposes which have been set forth, gives them that prestige, then the force and effect and value of that prestige goes with their work, and their work is to encourage arts and letters.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit another observation, I suggest that perhaps the way to determine the prestige they are entitled to have is by what they do, and that the mere incorporation of them by the National Government should not be used for the purpose of giving them a prestige that they may not deserve. I am not undertaking to express an opinion upon whether they are or are not the people to make of themselves the critics of art, but, assuming that they are, the justice of that assumption will be demonstrated by their action and by themselves. The French Academy does not gain its prestige by an act of incorporation by France. It gains it by the personnel of the association and the wisdom with which it exercises its functions; and some of the great of France have been great in spite of the refusal of that academy to reward them with recognition within its limited folds.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Can the gentleman think of any distinguished author in France, aside from Zola, whose work was not promptly recognized by that academy?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not while upon my feet at this moment, but I would guarantee to tell the gentleman several in a very few minutes if necessary.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey as to the merits of the whole matter. He refers to the French Academy, and suggests that this is in line with the idea it rests upon. Is it not true that English literature, without any academy, without any arbitrary critics, or any empirical method of deciding matters, is superior in nearly every respect to French literature, and is it not more in keeping with American affairs to leave the literary men, like other men, leeway, and let the public ultimately decide their merits without having them measured by any yardstick?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman by saying, in response to one of his several questions, if my opinion in the matter is of any value whatever, that as literature the literature of France to-day is superior to that of England to-day or of any other country.

In response to the gentleman's suggestion that there is no such aid to art or letters in England, I will remind him that it is just as much a strife for an English artist to become an academician as it will be for any American artist to become a member of this academy, and I will impress this subject upon his mind by suggesting the story, which does not bear out my suggestion of the importance of the British Academy, of the American, Whistler, who was a member of the Academy of British Artists. Having resigned, he was asked about the academy, and responded, "It has become the Academy of British." However, I would say to the gentleman that the influence of the British Academy upon art has been most excellent. The British Museum to-day is growing rapidly to be one of the best in the world, and the selection and collection of these masterpieces in the British Academy has been the result of the work of the British academicians, the Associated Artists of Great Britain.

Mr. GRAHAM. But the gentleman has not answered my query as to letters.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will be glad to answer that in a moment. For the present I yield to the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to ask him a question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a suggestion to the gentleman from New Jersey, my colleague on the committee. I call the gentleman's attention to a portion of his answers to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who had asked about this incorporation of American Arts and Sciences. I do not think that the gentleman understands that the National Academy of Science is already incorporated and that this corporation is to do for art and letters what has already been done for science.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Precisely. The gentleman from Kentucky lacked the advantage of hearing the opening of my remarks. The Academy of Science is already incorporated.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky is still of the same opinion that he was before he heard the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I understood the other society had been incorporated, but I was trying to bring out how it occurred that these men here named were chosen as the men to perpetuate themselves and their successors.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I tried to explain to the gentleman that this sort of body grows through the processes with which he is familiar. There is undoubtedly a very excellent club in the gentleman's town, a club of social distinction, which undoubtedly had its origin in this manner.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I never knew a social distinction worth having that required an act of incorporation to give it prestige.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This is not a social distinction that these gentlemen seek. Any literary distinction that could come to them has come to them from their own work. I call the gentleman's attention to the list here. Does he suppose that Mr. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, requires to be a part of an incorporation to have the gentleman from Kentucky acclaim him to be a great literary genius?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; and for that reason I would not ask that he be made part of a national incorporation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But he has asked it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would suggest to the gentleman that we have in this country a population of 90,000,000 people and there are some 50 names mentioned in this act of incorporation. I find that of those 50 the great majority come from one little section of the country. It may be that that section has a monopoly upon art. It may also be that it has a monopoly simply on a belief in its own importance. In any event, it does not strike me that this Congress, without having examined into the matter at all, should undertake to give the prestige these gentlemen so much seek, of national incorporation, to 50 gentlemen who choose to select themselves to pass on the eligibility of others to enter their sacred portals.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In conclusion, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that he will find there is something like a geographical center attached to these names; that a great many of these names are the names of aspiring, competent young men and women who have come to New York from other States, and possibly a number of them from Kentucky.

Mr. DIES rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, how much time does my colleague desire?

Mr. DIES. About 10 minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will yield first to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have given to the press the following interview:

"I have repeatedly been asked why I do not press the bill introduced by Mr. SIMS to repeal the exemption of coastwise ships from Panama Canal tolls. I have refrained from doing so for various reasons, some of which I will state, now that Senator ROOT has introduced a similar bill. I have always favored uniform tolls. I made the best fight I could and lost. I don't wish to appear ugly or sore, nor have I believed it wise to do anything that might embarrass the efforts of the President to settle differences with England by diplomacy. But the best reason of all is that I have not been satisfied that Congress is ready to repeal the exemption, nor that the President is ready to approve it. If I did so believe, I would vote to report out the Sims bill at once. When the President suggested that Congress disclaim intention to violate the treaty and provide for a judicial adjudication of the questions under the treaty, statesmen who helped him secure the discrimination refused to favor such disclaimer. I thought as the operation of the canal was a long ways off the President would have ample time to agree with England by making her some concessions elsewhere, if it should appear to be the settled policy of Congress to discriminate in favor of coastwise vessels. Just what concessions might be desired by England, or granted by this Government, I don't know, but there are a great many points at which the interests and transactions of the English people and our people come in contact. I thought that if there was a genuine desire for an adjustment it could be reached by a diligent effort to find a basis. I would never favor, however, making concessions of similar exemption to the Canadian coastwise trade. I have no doubt that would satisfy England, but it would mean a double burden to our people and a double inroad on the Treasury. If the exemption of our coastwise vessels deprives our Treasury of $2,000,000 per annum, a like concession to the Canadian coastwise trade would double the amount and deprive the Treasury of that much more money, and to that extent make the canal a heavier charge on the Treasury.

I do not care to discuss the question of arbitration. The State Department has that under consideration, and if Congress adheres to the position taken it is the duty of the State Department, first, to deal with international differences. It is not out of place, however, to say that when you are lost in the jungle the surest way to get out is to take the route by which you came in. It requires manhood to take the back track, and few men are big enough to display that much moral courage, but inasmuch as the President by a message aided the ship interests to mislead Congress into error, the President would earn a reputation for greatness if he would send a message to Congress advising a repeal of the exemption clause and confessing his error. There is no doubt that a great blunder has been committed, and the President could very greatly aid in correcting that blunder by adopting the above suggestion. Equality is common honesty. At the first blush that is what is naturally expected. The burden is on the party proposing a variation therefrom. Disinterested men expect and demand nothing else.

There are three reasons why uniform tolls should prevail.

First. All commerce using the canal, which shortens the journeys of all alike about 8,000 miles per journey, should equally share the expense of operating and maintaining the canal, which confers such great benefit upon all. There is little doubt that for the first few years the cost for the operation and maintenance will exceed the revenues derived from collecting from all vessels, except the official vessels belonging to our Government, all the uniform tolls that the traffic will bear. Optimists and theorists have prophesied otherwise, but their prophesy will come to naught. The operation and maintenance of the canal will for the first years be a charge upon the Treasury to some extent, and if our coastwise ships be exempt from tolls the charge on the Treasury will be a very large one. Just what effect discrimination in favor of our coastwise ships against all other vessels, including those of our own people in the foreign trade, will have in repelling business which would otherwise, under fair conditions, patronize our canal no man can tell, but whatever the extent may be it will surely be adverse to the patronage and profits of the canal.

Second. Exempting the coastwise ships from tolls is nothing more nor less than diverting from the common Treasury of the people a dollar and twenty cents per ton on ships belonging to a special interest, to which we give that large bonus and bounty out of the money belonging to all the people; and that special interest belongs to a body of people numerically insignificant, but financially powerful, already holding a monopoly of the coastwise trade against all the world, dividing up and parceling among them the ports and routes of travel, holding up rates by not competing with one another; they are the most highly protected people in the world and have absolutely no need of financial help from the Government.

The advocates and supporters of exemption make a mistake when they take comfort and press as unction to their souls the idea that there is a difference between this exemption and the ordinary subsidy; that they do not really take the money out out the Treasury, but only head it off and keep it from going into the Treasury. It is true the money is not actually in the Treasury, and it may be easier to fool the people and delude them into believing that nobody is taking their money and that there is nothing lost, but such people ought to read the ancient law which made it a greater crime to steal wet linen hanging out to dry than that which was actually locked up so it could be protected. If any difference, it is a meaner subsidy than taking from the Treasury direct. I am unable to find in the Constitution, my oath of office, or the Ten Commandments any justification to vote to take or divert money from the Treasury belonging to 96,000,000 people whom we represent and who are not here to pass on it themselves and give it to a small private interest.

Third. We are constructing that canal under a treaty. It was not convenient to cut the canal from ocean to ocean across our territory. We had to make two contracts, one with England and one with Panama, before we could construct a canal in a foreign country. Those who claim that conditions have changed by virtue of our sovereignty speak without due reference to diplomatic history. England expressly provided in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that no change in sovereignty should affect the stipulations of that treaty as to equality. Our sovereignty is decidedly imperfect if you remember the stipulations we made with Panama and the treaty by which it is claimed that we acquired sovereignty, for in that selfsame treaty we reaffirmed the stipulation as to equality of charges and conditions of traffic. We are under obligation in that same treaty to pay perpetually an annual rental of $250,000. Unfortunately, the Ship Trust, by the most stupendous and extended lobbying ever known on earth, conducted systematically ever since the work on the Panama Canal began, secured the aid of the yellow journals and procured the mistaken indorsements of various civic organizations throughout the country and inflamed the jingoes into obscuring the real question and substituting therefor in the popular mind the false and impertinent issue as to whether England shall be allowed to manage our affairs. There is no such question at issue. England has simply reminded us that we have agreed to charge everybody at the canal alike, which is the truth, and we ought to be honest with ourselves without the aid of England. If we would just observe Shakespeare's lines—

To thine own self be true, * * *
Thou canst not then be false to any man—

we would first deal fairly with our own people by refusing to give their money to special interests, then England would have no cause of complaint against us for broken faith through the violation of the treaty.

The construction England puts upon the treaty will inevitably and unavoidably be reached by anybody who will read the diplomatic history of transit across the Isthmus. Since the days of Henry Clay and John Quincy Adams, when Nicaragua first suggested to us the building of a canal, we have insisted on the very same position which England now holds—that all nations and all vessels and all commerce should be treated alike. We have ourselves often complained of alleged violations of that equality in other dealings and joint use of facilities with England, have insisted on correction, and have always obtained it. The claim that coastwise vessels can be treated differently from ships in the foreign trade is not sustained by an examination of our treaties. Among all the treaties we have made with other Governments for amity and commerce there is no distinction as to the privileges of different classes of vessels, except when it is expressly so stated. In every case when a nation desired to reserve domestic control of its coastwise trade it has been so stipulated in the treaty. The absence of such stipulations leaves no distinction in any case. In all treaties touching transit across the Isthmus the only case in which it is pretended that foreign vessels and commerce may be treated differently from domestic vessels and commerce is in the case of Mexico dealing with the Tehuantepec Railroad. Inasmuch as that railroad was built on Mexican soil entirely, beginning and ending at Mexican ports and constructed with Mexican capital or credit, she was not constrained by any consideration to grant equality to all. Standing in that condition, she rightfully and expressly stipulated that that railroad would treat all other nations alike, but favor Mexican commerce if it was desired. But constructing a canal across the Isthmus by a Government and by a people not resident on the Isthmus was entirely a different proposition. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty we were not permitted to build a Government canal; we were not permitted to fortify it; we were bound with other nations to protect its neutrality; and in the preamble and in section 8 we were all bound to exact equality in the operation of the canal in charges and conditions of traffic. In consideration of preserving those last provisions and stipulations unimpaired, and expressly so stated in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, our Government and England modified the Clayton-Bulwer treaty so as to permit us to construct it at our Government's expense, operate, and take the profits, we further agreeing to relieve England and the balance of the world of preserving neutrality, and therefore we were permitted to police and fortify the canal. In brief, that is all there is to it. Unless we do have the manliness to protect our honor among the nations and protect the interests of our people and the integrity of the Treasury by voluntarily repealing the exemption of the coastwise ships from tolls, I do not see how we are going to escape submitting to arbitration and maintain any pretense to honor and respect among the nations of the world.

I am very much surprised to find advocates of the exemption opposing submission to arbitration, because one argument the advocates of the special privileges used to carry the exemption through Congress was that we could assume the right under the treaty to make the exemption, let England make the issue if she wished to object, formulate an issue, and submit it to arbitration. In the House, pending the consideration of the canal bill, that proposition was replied to by me. When the President manifested uneasiness and confusion on suddenly discovering the dissatisfaction of England, just before he signed the canal bill, I drew a bill to repeal the exemption, intending to introduce it as soon as the President signed the bill for the operation of the canal. Being called away before that approval came in, I gave the bill to Mr. SIMS and requested him to introduce it, which he afterwards did. I do not care to do a useless piece of work; but if I become satisfied in the next five weeks that Congress would pass the Sims bill and that the President would approve it, I will call it up in the committee and do my best to have it reported. If I discover no such favorable indications, I shall favor waiting for the next Congress and the next administration to deal with the subject—protect the interests of our people, preserve the integrity of our Treasury, and maintain the honor of our Republic among the nations of the world.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a parliamentary question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My understanding of the rules is that I had one hour in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had one hour, beginning at 5 minutes before 4 o'clock.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the opposition have an hour also?

The SPEAKER. Not if the gentleman moves the previous question and gets it carried during his hour.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have assured the gentlemen who are opposed to this measure that I will not move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman who gets the floor has an hour, if he wants it, and can do as he pleases with it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I reserve the balance of my time and yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I want to be recognized in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] reserves 30 minutes. The gentleman from Georgia was on his feet and had the eye of the Chair, and the Chair recognizes him for one hour.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a privilige of the gentleman who has an hour to yield to other gentlemen?

The SPEAKER. Yes; he can yield every particle of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I thought.

Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to consume the time of the House in presenting my views in opposition to this bill. Its purpose may be meritorious, though it does not appeal to me that Congress should be called upon simply to give prestige to the incorporation, or give to the gentlemen who have sought to compose that corporation the power and authority to be incorporated by Congress, simply to give it prestige. I have nothing to say in criticism of these gentlemen here who are sought to be incorporated under this bill. It but demonstrates, Mr. Speaker, what I have called attention to before, that if Congress shall embark into the business of incorporating everybody for any and every purpose that they desire, we will be engaged in doing very little else. All powers of the State will be minimized, and if people think they can secure a charter from Congress which will carry with it the prestige and power of the National Government, you will find the House flooded with bills and our calendars crowded with this kind of legislation.

I had occasion, when the House was considering other bills of this character, Mr. Speaker, to state my opposition to them. It is true this bill says it is to be incorporated under a certain name in the District of Columbia.

To obviate the necessity of continually appealing to Congress to incorporate or grant charters incorporating people for the purposes of this and like character in the District of Columbia, Congress has already provided a method by which charters can be obtained in the District of Columbia. But that is too small a business for gentlemen who aspire to have the authority and prestige of the United States Government given them by special charters. They want the power and the prestige and the authority of the Government of the United States behind them. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that Congress either has the power to grant this sort of charter, or that it ought to be the policy of Congress to grant it.

Congress, if it saw fit, if it has the power, if it has the constitutional authority to grant indiscriminate charters of this kind, or every kind, it has it by reason of its supreme sovereignty over subjects matter of this character, by reason of its inherent power as a sovereign to grant charters, however far the courts may have gone with reference to extending the powers of Congress to grant charters. However far the courts may have gone with reference to extending the powers of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States has never yet decided that Congress had any inherent power to grant a charter. On the contrary, the only enunciation upon that subject has been that Congress did not have the inherent power to grant charters, and it only had power to grant them when it undertook to give to the corporation some public duty or performs some act for the Government.

I instance other occasions that carried out that theory, namely, when you created a bank to become the fiscal agent of the Government or to issue money as part of the fiscal agent of the Government, in the case of the United States Bank or the National Bank, or in the case of the incorporation of the great transcontinental railroad companies, with authority to convey the military forces of the United States or develop the undeveloped lands of the United States, and another, where they granted the right of a bridge company to build a bridge across a navigable stream, by reason of the fact that Congress could regulate interstate commerce and had control of the navigable streams of the country. Those are the only charters which the courts have yet approved as being within the power of Congress to grant. Here we have applications for charters of various kinds. There is, if I mistake not, upon the calendar an application to charter a national board of trade. Whenever a body of men want to display themselves before the United States or the world as something beyond the common ordinary corporations that can get a charter from the States or the District of Columbia or the Territories, they want attached to it the great seal of this great Republic, in order to give them prestige and power at home and abroad. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am deaf to all appeals like this and all requests to me to withdraw any objections I may have with reference to granting this kind of charter.

This charter, like the others, gives the incorporation power to hold real and personal property. Without some statement being contained in the bill to the contrary, it might be held by the courts, and doubtless it would be so held, that a State could not tax the property of a corporation that was incorporated by Congress, if Congress had authority to grant the charter. That was the decision in the case of McCullough against Maryland.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. With pleasure, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. I see by section 5 it is provided that—

> The American Academy of Arts and Letters be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to receive bequests and donations on real or personal property and to hold the same in trust, and to invest and reinvest the same for the purpose of furthering the interests of literature and the fine arts.

Now, by the provision of that section could not the organization enter into speculation in both real and personal property? It has the right under this provision to invest and reinvest. That, of course, would give the power to convey and to have conveyed and to buy and sell as a speculative matter, and easily it might take shelter under the other provision of the act. Now, has it not the power under that provision?

Mr. BARTLETT. The power is to hold and to receive donations of real and personal property, "and to hold the same in trust, and to invest and reinvest the same for the purpose of furthering the interests of literature and the fine arts." I do not doubt but that they could receive donations, which they could increase by investment either in personal or real estate. I do not know about speculation. I apprehend these gentlemen do not speculate. I do not know that they do. Anyhow, there is nothing in the charter to prevent them doing what the gentleman from Indiana thinks they might do. In other words, it would not be ultra vires, in order to increase their profits and administer the property they had, to speculate either in personal or real estate.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, if the power is given under that provision to purchase and sell real estate, although the intention for which the organization is to be incorporated now may be of the character expressed in the bill, yet in the succeeding management of the trustees the intention might be changed, and still under this provision, if it did change, they would have the right to enter it upon a business career and buy and sell and speculate, and should not that section, at least, be amended if the bill is passed?

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no limit in this bill at the present time as to what this corporation may do in the matter of holding and investing and reinvesting in property for the purpose of increasing its profits.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further there?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, before the passage of this bill ought not some limitation be made as an amendment to section 5 to prevent just such procedure as that?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think it ought to be made. But so far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in perfecting a bad bill in order to enable it to pass, when I do not think that, however good it may be, I would under any circumstances vote for it. I am opposed to this kind of legislation, not altogether upon the idea that it is not as good as we may make it but because no matter how good you make it it is bad, and I shall not vote for it on other grounds. There is no purpose, Mr. Speaker, however good, that would lead me to support such a bill as this. I want to say that I voiced these views even when the purpose was good, as in the case of the Red Cross Society, when its incorporation was proposed here. I have said I would not vote for the incorporation of the Carnegie Fund, or vote to incorporate the Red Cross Society or the National Board of Trade. There is no purpose, however good, Mr. Speaker, which would induce me to forsake the position that I have occupied upon legislation of this kind, and that position is that such legislation ought not to find in this House a place to be considered and adopted. My objection to this legislation goes to the root and foundation of it, and not to the details of it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman find in this bill any reservation to a future Congress of the power to change or amend or alter the charter in any respect?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not found it, but that power rests in Congress whether it is there or not.

Mr. WILLIS. The Dartmouth College case involved that question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and the Dartmouth College case has been in many cases departed from since that decision.

Mr. WILLIS. If the bill is to pass—and I am not in favor of its passage in its present form—ought there not to be a section inserted reserving the power to amend, alter, or repeal in a future Congress?

Mr. BARTLETT. It would not only be safe, but it would be advisable to amend it in that respect.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman believe that in the granting of a charter, even one that is proper at any time, we should make it perpetual? This is a perpetual charter which is asked for.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I do not, and the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] would cure that feature.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman think that any charter ought to be granted for a longer period than 50 years? That is half a century.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would not think it ought to be longer. It depends on the purposes of the corporation and what they are required to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the proper time I want to make a motion to strike out the enacting clause. I could not add to my objections if I were to repeat them, nor could I enforce them with any additional statement which I might make.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. With pleasure.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana prompts me to submit an inquiry to the gentleman from Georgia as to whether he has any information as to the basis upon which this illustrious list was limited to 50?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Take for illustration the State of Indiana. Everybody knows that malaria in that State, commingled with natural gas, has been transformed into inspiration for genius. Yet we have in this list only one genius from Indiana. I want to know why George Ade and Booth Tarkington and the two McCutcheons have been excluded from this illustrious list? [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOP. And Charles S. Major.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman should not forget the Sweet Singer of Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not forget any of the sweet singers of Michigan, but time will not permit me even to attempt to enumerate them.

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not answer the gentleman, except to say that it must appear from the colloquy between my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] that these 50 immortals have met, either by themselves or in company with others who were willing to give them as much immortality of this sort as they could in this way, and put them forward as the 50 immortals who alone are worthy of this great consideration at the hands of Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman will concede that it is not fair to Indiana.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentleman will yield, I will say that Booth Tarkington, George Ade, and the entire McCutcheon family, as well as a large and estimable collection from the literary belt of Indiana, are already members of the institute. As suggested by my friend from Missouri, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, they are already members of the lower house, and undoubtedly will be elevated to the upper house when they grow older and are more dignified and have a more fatherly expression. George Ade is a very young-looking man and so is Booth Tarkington. The McCutcheon family range from 10 to 70. I do not know how many of them there are. They are all brilliant. They are Indianans, and that means that they are brilliant. They are all in the institute and they will all be in the academy some day, and that ought to satisfy the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; I am from Michigan. But I want to ask the gentleman, is antiquity an essential element in eligibility to this list?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not at all; but the gentleman has observed the progress of the work of artists and literary men, and he knows that they do not do their work best while they are in knickerbockers.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in conclusion that I am sorry that these distinguished gentleman from Indiana who have been referred to are not named in this bill if they desire to be. If they were, no doubt their names would add something to it; but whether those who have been left out were put in or whether those who have been embraced were stricken from it, I should still oppose the measure, although I might do so more reluctantly if the gentlemen from Indiana who have been referred to were among the incorporators.

I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOUSTON). The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, at the proper time I desire to offer this amendment as a new section:

SEC. 6. That said corporation shall not have power to buy, sell, rent, lease, or hold any real estate or any interest in any real estate for the purpose of deriving profit therefrom; that any real estate or any interest in any real estate which it shall receive by gift, grant, bequest, devise, or donation shall be converted into cash by public sale upon reasonable notice within one year from the time it is so received.

Mr. Speaker, this is said to be a harmless little corporation. I hope it is so. I hope it is only one of the highbrowed frills of upper literarydom; but I am not concerned with that feature.

The Committee on the Library has been bringing in here from time to time bills for Federal incorporation, conferring special privileges and special favors—privileges and favors not enjoyed by corporations otherwise incorporated.

If one corporation were all, I should not look with so much horror upon the possibilities of this legislation, but with the multitudinous number of these corporations coming in we shall have over this country a landlordism and a tenantry that will put old Ireland to shame.

There is now pending upon the calendar the bill for the incorporation of the Rockefeller Foundation Fund, authorizing it to invest $100,000,000 in real estate if it so desires. If they would take $100,000,000 into the State of my good friend, the gentleman from Mississippi who sits just in front of me [Mr. SISSON], and invest it in farm lands to-day, in 10 years that $100,000,000 would grow to be worth $1,000,000,0000, and upon that billion dollars' worth of real estate owned by the proposed corporation would be a tenantry as much subject to Rockefeller and his tribe as have been the unhappy citizens of old Ireland to the English landlords in days gone by.

Mr. Speaker, the lands of this country ought to belong to the people who live upon them.

It is said that the purposes of these corporations are for charity, for literature, for uplifts. But, Mr. Speaker, the capital they have is not devoted to that purpose. The capital of the Rockefeller Foundation is to be devoted to earning profit in competition with the citizens of this country who have to make a living for themselves and their families. The rents and profits that shall be derived by the Rockefeller Foundation Fund, by this high-browed literary crowd, and by the multitudinous other corporations that are being given these special charters, will all be brought to Washington and held in the District of Columbia. It is not for the common welfare that there should be built up in the capital at Washington the immense capitalism that these bills will stimulate. This capital ought not to be made the center of wealthy classes who drain profits from every part of the Republic, whether for charity, for self-enrichment, for the uplift of high-browed literati, or for any other purpose. The effects of such a policy must be vicious and hurtful to our people.

A few years ago foreign landlordism became so grievous that some of our States had to legislate against it. One English earl owns, I am told, 20,000 acres of the finest and fairest farm land in Missouri. It is inhabited by his tenants. He is farming in competition with the citizens of my State and taking the profits away to far-off England.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not nearly so bad as to have corporations housed and homed here in Washington, with illimitable capital, with power of making illimitable investment in lands to be used to earn profit in competition with the people who have to earn a living for themselves and families.

What does Rockefeller want to do? Take his money and give it to charity? No; he wants to pursue the same line he has always pursued, of grasping profit in competition with the people. He says he will devote the profits to charitable purposes. Who will be the judge? The toplofty board of directors will be the judge as to what constitutes charity.

Mr. Speaker, an overspreading and overawing monopoly of land owned by the proposed Rockefeller Foundation Fund ought not have life breathed into it by Congress. It is said to be for charity; but that makes no difference. It would be oppressive to the people none the less.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will use five minutes of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I lose any of my rights or my time by not using it now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOUSTON). The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the eloquent and earnest remarks of my friend from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who always talks interestingly and sometimes convincingly; but I am afraid that in this instance he has set up a man of straw, and particularly is he wrong in his apparent charge against the Committee on the Library of having furthered that monstrosity, the Rockefeller Foundation, the aspect of which so affrights him.

The committee had nothing to do with that. As a Member of this House, I did say when the matter was up the other day that if Mr. Rockefeller wanted, out of his huge fortune, to give the people of this country $100,000,000 I would not object; that if he wanted to double the amount and turn it over to the public I should rejoice twice as much. My understanding of that bill was that he was not giving or investing this money for profit to retain control himself, but that he gave the principal to the Rockefeller Foundation, the earnings of which presumably will go on for centuries after Mr. Rockefeller has been gathered to his fathers and will be devoted to the spread of science and the advancement of medical and other branches of science in the interest of the human family.

But that has nothing to do with the bill. A statement was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the effect that the bill should be amended so as to give Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act. I want to say, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman, that I have not the slightest objection to that being done. Nor have I any objection to the essence of what was proposed by my friend from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. Mr. SHACKLEFORD's argument was, when you get away from his talk about the Rockefeller Foundation and the monstrous accumulation of money in the hands of Mr. Rockefeller, that he objected to having the corporation become a landlord and objected to it owning large quantities of land from which it could exact rent forever. Mr. Speaker, I am not lacking in sympathy with that suggestion, and when properly shaped I think I would be willing, and I think the other members of the Committee of the Library would be willing, to accept it as an amendment to the bill.

This committee wants to do whatever is right to shape this measure, so that if this body of men is ever created it will be for the good of the public. If there shall be selected a few of these "high-brow" literati the gentleman speaks about, we want them chosen because of merit. We want them to be the most distinguished men in the country for art and letters. We want membership in that body to be an inspiration to the younger men in those various branches of the fine arts, to drive them on to better and ever better work, in order that they may reflect glory upon themselves and be a credit to the country. I take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that there is not much question of the right of this Congress to grant such a charter. It has done so in many instances. Whether that is a proper power to lodge with this body is not a question to-day. But I believe it has the power. I could not of course enter into a discussion of fine legal points with my learned friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. I believe it has the power. The only question is whether it can exercise it with wisdom on this occasion.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I simply want to ask whether this measure, as drawn, still reserves to Congress sole authority to modify, repeal, or revoke it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have just stated that an amendment of that kind was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], and I was quite willing to accept it as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, before the very, very brief discussion that I want to give to the measure, I desire to beg leave respectfully to disagree with the sentiment expressed by my colleague [Mr. SLAYDEN]. I would not have the American Nation take the Rockfeller millions or the Carnegie millions. This is a great, a wealthy, and a wonderful nation of people. Our children ought to be taught that the accumulation of great wealth or the accumulation of wealth in any quantity, by means deemed in the eye of public justice to be wrong, is a disgrace to those who acquire it, rather than an honor. I commiserate men like Mr. Carnegie who want to bribe history and ameliorate the judgment of posterity upon their business careers; but as a Member of this great Congress I am not willing to help them soothe the wounds that come to them from having pursued a course which pricks their conscience.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this bill, unless some satisfactory explanation of its origin and its purpose shall be presented to the House. I want to know by what process this committee selected these particular 50 names to incorporate in a sort of body of nobility of letters and arts and make them the 50-charter members upon which to base this exclusive order in America.

For instance, if another society selected these 50 names I would like to know the processes by which they selected them; and if they were selected by this committee I hope its chairman or some member of the committee will tell us how it arrived at the conclusion that these particular 50 names were entitled, by reason of their greatness in achievement, to have the seal of approval placed upon them by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield in order that I may give him an answer to his inquiry?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I strove with such vigor to obtain that information during the gentleman's remarks that I shall now have to forego the pleasure of hearing his explanation at this moment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman not add to the inquiry which he has made this: That there shall be an explanation of what this corporation is to do after it is created?

Mr. DIES. Precisely. That is true; and moreover, of course, you and I have read all the books and viewed all the paintings and gazed upon all of the sculpture, the product of these wonderful hundred hands; but perchance some gentleman from Indiana or from some Western State which is new, grown up like a mushroom, which has not yet produced its names for immortality, whose people have been too busy in careers of farming or politics—perchance they have not yet had time to gaze upon this architecture, this sculpture, these paintings; and gentlemen, before they vote as Members of Congress to set up an order of superiority, would like to know if the committee has gone into the merits of these several productions. I know you would at least like to know something about it yourselves.

Of course, you understand what Thomas Raynesford Lounsbury, of Connecticut, has done, and you understand what John Singer Sargent, of Massachusetts, has done, what Horace Howard Furness, of Pennsylvania, has done. That is known to all of you—that is, those of you who have devoted hours to the pursuit of knowledge and of literature and of art—as well as it is known to myself; but ought I, because my life has been more fortunate than yours, because the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND], for instance, and myself in our closets have delved into these wonderful works and gazed upon these wonderful works of art and read the productions of these wonderful men—ought we to take snap judgment on you gentlemen who are more or less rustic in the arts and in literature? [Laughter and applause.]

For myself, Mr. Speaker, as I gaze back now upon my moments of leisure, when I pored over literature and read the works of critiques of art while a good many of you were busily engaged getting elected to Congress, in the magnanimity of my soul, I am not willing to vote these 50 men upon you until you at least know which ones are painters, which sculptors, and which are authors. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not desire to interrupt the charming flow of the gentleman's discourse, but I would like to know whether he should not regard the persons included in this particular list more as a matter of business, incorporated for promotive purposes, rather than as a matter of selection?

Mr. DIES. I take the explanation of a member of the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND], who says it is to be likened to the Academy of Arts in France, where it is worth a king's ransom to have your name enrolled, and where the body corporate places a badge of honor upon the remotest generations.

Mr. HOBSON. That is the gist of the question I am asking the gentleman. Does he regard a corporate body in America that might have any names, irrespective of accomplishments, that might involve many business operations in promotion of this or any other business, because they are incorporated and are made a body apart, subject to the laws——

Mr. DIES. And I say, in no degree of pique or resentment, that that new raw-beef-producing State of Texas is not honored with an inclusion here. I do not feel at all piqued that the great Southern States and the great Western States are not honored at all with an inclusion here. I know that we have come up like a mushroom. I know, of course, that we are new in the business, and could hardly be expected to be included in this list of men of letters. And, on the subject of lists, Mr. Speaker, I am just about thinking who would have been considered to have written the works of Shakespeare if these 50 had passed upon it? How about the letters of Junius, about which the world has never decided the authorship? And I am wondering as to Michael Montesquieu, when he presented his manuscript to the greatest pursuers of literature and art in France, and they said that its publication would disgrace him, if these 50 had to do with them?

I would not establish a corporation of literature and art in this country, where men may adorn themselves with badges and support themselves on the balance of the citizens. But if your committee want to do it, let us do it in a businesslike way.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I could not undertake to give all my objections to this bill in five minutes. I agree very heartily with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] have said in reference to this bill, but my chief objection to the bill as it is now drawn is section 5. In the first place, I am opposed to any corporation, either State or Federal, owning any land for agricultural purposes, and I am unwilling the corporation shall own the land for any other purpose than that of executing the purpose for which the corporation was chartered. I am willing for a corporation to own land for the purpose of establishing manufacturing plants, building railroads, etc., but not to own land to rent, farm, or to speculate in, for there is no monopoly that is half so wicked as a land monopoly.

Now, in all of these charters that are being issued like this an effort is being made to get estate in land so that the income of the corporation will be fixed and permanent and nothing can be found that will be so permanent for vast sums of money as to invest in real estate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will my friend from Mississippi permit me a moment?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did you hear my statement that we were quite willing to accept an amendment to meet that objection about land owning?

Mr. SISSON. That does not mean necessarily that the amendment would pass the House. I presume it would if the gentleman would accept it. But it shows how poorly this bill has been conceived. It shows that the bill originally conceived the idea of permitting incorporations of this kind to buy and sell and deal in and own real estate. I am opposed to any Federal charter that would grant to a Federal incorporation the right to own and to control land in any State.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] says that he is willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. Some of these charters which have been passed have no such limitation or restriction in them as that, and I am glad the gentleman from Texas is now willing to accept that amendment. I also understand the gentleman from Texas is willing to accept an amendment limiting the life of a charter to 50 years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What I said was at the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], which was as to the right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman states it correctly.

Mr. SISSON. This House on several occasions in the past has declined to grant charters of any kind for longer than 50 years. I do not know why this corporation should be exempt. But I sincerely trust that in the future when bills of this kind are brought into the House there will be no power in the bill granting the corporation authorizing them to own real estate in any of the States except just so much as is necessary to transact properly the business for which the corporation is organized. Why, out in my own State millions of dollars are being invested in farm lands by corporations organized in England, in Holland, in New Jersey, and in other places which grant the most liberal charters, and many thousands of acres of land in my State are passing out of the hands and control of the people of the State. The trouble with Ireland to-day is the fact that the land of Ireland is not owned by the Irish people. The revolution in Mexico to-day finds its reason originally in the landlord system in that country. There is a man in Mexico who owns an estate, which he got from a Spanish land grant, that is two-thirds as large as my own State. In other words, gentlemen of the House, no monopoly can ever be half as wicked as a land monopoly, and if this bill should pass as it was originally drawn it would give these people the right for all time to come to own real estate and to continue to buy real estate.

In the past the English people have had trouble with great corporations owning lands and passing them into dead hands so that the ownership may be perpetual.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from Georgia give me a few minutes more?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. The struggle in England in reference to the ownership of land in the early days was a terrific struggle, because so much land had passed out of the hands of the people and into the hands of the church. Now, no man will deny that the establishment of the Christian church was one of the greatest of all the purposes of the organization of a corporation or any other institution in the world, and because this organization now under discussion happens to be an organization which intends to promote letters and the arts is no reason why it should become a part of numbers of corporations that may go out and own and operate farms in competition with the people of your State and mine.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact that a number of the States have adopted in their constitutions provisions which force all corporations to alienate their lands except what they have in actual use?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. In the constitution of the State of Oklahoma it is provided that no corporation shall own any land except for agricultural purposes, and that three years after the acquirement of an estate, if it is bought in to satisfy a judgment or other indebtedness, they are compelled to alienate the land. In the State of Illinois, in the case referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], a law was passed to prevent a corporation from owning farm lands and to prevent monopoly.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, I will say we do not allow any corporation to own land for any purpose except for the purpose of incorporation.

Mr. GARNER. We require the same thing in the State of Texas.

Mr. CARLIN. And we require the same thing in Virginia.

Mr. SISSON. But many of the States of the Union do not do that. We had to pass in the Legislature of Mississippi, at the last session of the legislature, a law to prevent the corporate ownership of land, because in one body 80,000 acres of land had passed into the hands of an English syndicate, which proposed to farm it out with the cheapest labor they could get. The law in my own State is not half as drastic as it should be. The people of my State raised quite a protest, and the State legislature has endeavored to stop it, but have not gone far enough.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] makes the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 23.

So the House decided to adjourn.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 16, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of said company for the year 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1270); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor, reporting claims for damages which have been considered, adjusted, and determined by the Commission of Lighthouses in favor of the Union Steamship Co. and in favor of the S. E. Slade Lumber Co., all of San Francisco, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 1269); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 369) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give certain old Government documents to the Old Newbury Historical Society, of Newburyport, Mass., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1302), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) providing for an American commission for the investigation of rural credits in Europe, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1303), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27713) granting an increase of pension to Annie Conroy, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 28093) to amend the general pension act of May 11, 1912; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McCOY: A bill (H. R. 28094) to amend section 96, chapter 5, of the act of Congress of March 3, 1911, entitled "The Judicial Code"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 28095) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make per capita payments to members of the Five Civilized Tribes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 28096) granting an increase of compensation to bookbinders, printers, and pressmen in the Government Printing Office; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. CARLIN (by request): A bill (H. R. 28097) to establish land and coin banks and to increase the currency; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. DIES: A bill (H. R. 28098) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Sabine River at Orange, Tex.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 28099) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 28100) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to recover the hull, guns, and other equipment of the U. S. frigate Philadelphia, now lying in the harbor of Tripoli, and making appropriation therefor; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. GALLAGHER: Resolution (H. Res. 776) instructing the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate profits of national banks, and to make report of such facts as it ascertains; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANSBERRY: A bill (H. R. 28101) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. H. Hankins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 28102) granting an increase of pension to Mary H. Johnston; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 28103) granting a pension to Catherine C. Weeks; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28104) granting a pension to Mary MacArthur; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28105) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Stewart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28106) granting an increase of pension to Robert Pratt; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28107) granting an increase of pension to Fritz Janzen; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CULLOP: A bill (H. R. 28108) granting an increase of pension to John T. Langley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28109) granting an increase of pension to Reuben S. McClun; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EDWARDS: A bill (H. R. 28110) for the relief of F. G. Hodges; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28111) for the relief of the heirs of John Van Landingham; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FOWLER: A bill (H. R. 28112) granting a pension to Daniel Linder; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GOULD: A bill (H. R. 28113) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Hall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GRAY: A bill (H. R. 28114) granting a pension to Rebbecca S. Merritt; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HINDS: A bill (H. R. 28115) granting a pension to Priscilla E. Fletcher; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28116) to amend and correct the military record of Robert Pearson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KONOP: A bill (H. R. 28117) granting a pension to Virginia M. Gaspard; to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1913.

Rev. Oliver Johnson, of Winnsboro, S. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, who art in heaven, we all need that wisdom which cometh down from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy. Make each of us earnestly to desire that his wisdom may be Thy wisdom and his will Thy will, that the Divine approval may rest upon all our acts. And whatsoever things are true and honest and of good report, may we think on those things, and so think on them that we shall love them and do them. Through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) laid before the Senate communications from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact and conclusions filed by the court in the following causes:

R. 23001) to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the carrying of dangerous articles on passenger steamers, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1118) thereon.

CROW INDIANS OF MONTANA.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back Senate resolution 352, with a substitute, and I submit a report (No. 1110) thereon. It is short, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read by title for information.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will first be read as introduced.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TOWNSEND July 6, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place in the hands of the Attorney General such papers, records, and other information in reference to the affairs of the Crow Indians of Montana as will enable the Attorney General to investigate such affairs and to bring such action as may be necessary to protect the interests and secure the rights of said Indians; and the Attorney General is hereby authorized to make such investigation and to bring such action, if any, as the investigation may disclose to be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Public Lands proposes a complete substitute, to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized to investigate the affairs of the Crow Indians of Montana and to bring and prosecute such action as may be necessary to protect the interests and secure the rights of such Indians, or of any member of them, and all departments of the Government are authorized to turn over to the Attorney General such records, papers, and other information as he may require to make such investigation or bring such action.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is the nature of the work which the resolution calls for?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There have been a number of investigations of the Crow Indian Agency and its affairs, and it never seems to have been settled satisfactorily to anyone. This resolution is for the purpose of putting it under the Department of Justice and having that department investigate and make report, leaving to them discretion by moving in the matter or not, as they see fit.

Mr. BORAH. Does the resolution authorize and instruct the Attorney General to proceed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It authorizes him; it does not instruct him.

Mr. BORAH. Does he need any authorization now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rather think he does, under the practice of the departments. I do not think he would feel disposed to do it without such an authorization.

Mr. BORAH. What I had in mind particularly was that at the last session when we undertook to pass a resolution here directing the Attorney General to proceed with a certain prosecution it was claimed that we had no authority to do it. I am very glad to see the precedent established.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to see it established myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is simply the question of consideration, and that is not debatable.

Mr. DIXON. I do not care to object to the consideration of the resolution. I think, in justice to the Senate, there ought to be some explanation made of this matter by at least some member of the Committee on Indian Affairs who knows the circumstances.

If the purpose of the resolution was not to investigate an Indian reservation within my own State, I would object to it without any hesitancy whatever, but for fear my action might be misconstrued, simply because the Crow Reservation is situated in the State of Montana, I shall not object to its consideration. I do think that the passage of this resolution is a foolish piece of business.

Mr. WARREN. Then why not object?

Mr. DIXON. Because it is within my own State I fear my objection might be misconstrued. I want to say to Senators who are not familiar with the Crow Reservation matter that the Committee on Indian Affairs for five successive winters have heard this woman come before it and tell her story.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon, but is this the woman Gray?

Mr. DIXON. Helen Pierce Gray. She has repeatedly been before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs; last year she was before the House committee; and she has caused, I think, up to this time an expenditure of at least $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now whether the resolution shall be considered.

Mr. DIXON. I shall not object to its consideration, but when it comes up for passage I shall want to make a statement to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BROWN. I think the resolution ought to be printed and lie over for a day, so as to give us an opportunity to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly, if there is any objection, it will go over.

Mr. BROWN. I do object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska objects.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask unanimous consent of the Senate for just about three minutes to explain more than what appears in the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. DIXON. Five years ago Helen Pierce Gray came to Washington with a story of crime and misconduct and maladministration on the Crow Reservation.

I want to say that there is not an officer on the Crow Reservation, there is not an employee there, who was ever appointed through my recommendation or influence, and I do not think I know personally a single employee on the Crow Reservation. I have never seen the present agent. He has been there for two years.

When Mrs. Gray first appeared before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate some of us were much impressed by this woman's story and sat patiently for six weeks and heard her story concerning Crow Reservation affairs. The committee authorized the bringing to Washington of Chief Plenty Coos and a delegation of 8 or 10 of the chiefs and head men of the tribe. They came down here and we heard their story day after day.

The result of that investigation was the printing of the hearings, a book of 800 pages, which is still on file, and any Member of the Senate can read it. It resulted in a lot of voluminous, indiscriminate charges against every employee of the reservation—against Commissioner Leupp, against Secretary Garfield, against President Roosevelt—charging every one of them with being criminally connected with the administration of Crow Reservation affairs.

After the whole winter's investigation the committee unanimously instructed the Secretary to send out special agents and investigate thoroughly. The Indian Bureau investigated not once but three different times, by three different special agents, all of the charges then made by this same woman.

The Indian Rights' Association was very much concerned over this woman's story and sent two of their special agents—Sniffens and Brosius—to the Crow Reservation to investigate. Before the investigation was over she had not only included in her list of indictments every member of the Interior Department but the Indian Rights' Association as well. She charged that the agents of the Indian Rights' Association were also in some way mixed up in some great, mysterious steal.

The next winter the Senate committee again heard the same story. I think the next winter we again heard Crow Reservation charges, and another delegation of Crow Indians again were brought to Washington to testify before the committee.

Last year the House Committee on Indian Affairs took up the matter and put this woman on the pay roll and gave orders to the Interior Department to give Mrs. Gray carte blanche authority to investigate all the records. She was there for months on the pay roll of the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

Every inspector who investigated reported the Crow Indian Reservation as clean of any maladministration as any other Indian reservation.

We never could get any specific charges made. If they were, they were of such character that immediately resolved themselves into thin air on a candid investigation of the records of the Indian office.

Now, what were the charges before the committee? I want to say to the Senate that the Committee on Indian Affairs at this time is simply running away from this continuous investigation of the Crow Reservation, and, by reporting this resolution to "authorize the Attorney General to investigate," washing its hands. They do not want to hear any more trouble about the Crow Indians, and they think it is the easiest way—I am putting it mildly—to pass a resolution and have the Attorney General's office investigate it.

It has been investigated by special agents of the Secretary's office and special agents of the Indian Office. This woman has charged both Commissioners Leupp and Valentine with being criminals, and she charged Secretary Fisher the other morning in open committee with being a criminal and mixed up with some great conspiracy "that would shock the world." Every person who has in any way sought to elucidate the charges made by Mrs. Gray and find out what has been the trouble on the Crow Reservation, has been immediately included in her category of criminals.

If there is anything on the Crow Reservation that needs investigating, I think I would be the first man in the Senate to ask to have it done. As I said, I do not even know the present Indian agent. He has been there over two years. I understand that he is a brother of ex-Congressman Scott, of Kansas, who had been in the Indian service and was transferred to Crow Agency from some other place.

I have heard Mrs. Gray make many charges about Crow Reservation matters which I knew were not true, which could not be true. I heard her one morning in the committee make the charge that 10 town sites on the Huntley irrigation project, which at one time was a part of the Crow Indian Reservation, had been surreptitiously turned over to the Burlington Railroad. As a matter of fact, these town sites do not even lie on the line of the Burlington Railroad; they are lands that lie along the Northern Pacific Railroad.

But charges of this kind have been made without any shadow of foundation of any kind, made equally with the same positive assertion as something which might possibly be founded in fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. Who is she?

Mr. DIXON. Helen Pierce Gray.

Mr. GALLINGER. A Montana woman?

Mr. DIXON. No; a Minnesota woman. In the Committee on Indian Affairs the other morning, with the kindest intent, I asked her to make specific these charges. Immediately the person who makes the inquiry is branded as a criminal himself.

She charged the other morning that Indians had been murdered there; that one Indian in the city of Billings had been murdered in a hotel and boxed up in a coffin, and hermetically sealed, and sent to the reservation to be buried, so that nobody could find out how he was killed. He was Alexander Upshaw. I remember him. As I now remember the actual facts, he was killed in a drunken row of some kind in the city of Billings. But these stories are spread before the Committee on Indian Affairs as positive facts.

As a Member of the Senate I think it is my duty, as one member of the Committee on Indian Affairs who has patiently heard these stories for five successive winters, who has heard delegations of the Crows themselves, to state that the Crow chiefs and the head men are on record in the Indian Office that they do not want this woman to come back there and make any more trouble. I heard Inspector McLaughlin, of the Indian service, the oldest inspector in that service, the man who wrote the book My Friend the Indian, and who is probably the best authority on Indian affairs of any man living, say that if this woman had gone to the Sioux Reservation and scattered these insinuating stories among those poor, ignorant, and illiterate Indians, you would have had to call out the United States troops to put down the insurrection that would have followed.

This resolution was reported by the committee with only three members present. Three different Secretaries of the Interior—Garfield, Ballinger, and Fisher—have investigated the charges made by Mrs. Gray.

Two different Indian commissioners, Leupp and Valentine, have investigated through their inspectors; the Indian Rights Association have patiently investigated all these matters; and this woman now brands each of these officials and all the inspectors as bad and criminal. Now, the Indian Committee pass the matter on to the Department of Justice and say they may or may not investigate it. That is the extent of the resolution. If the Senate wants to pass it, well and good. If it did not affect a matter within my State, I would fight it to a finish, because I believe it is a pure waste of time and money. You are authorizing the Department of Justice to make the investigation if they want to do so. That is all there is in it; it amounts to nothing more.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not feel that this matter ought to rest here even for the day, going over, as it does, until to-morrow, without some kind of a statement in reply to the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON].

I am not personally interested in any matter connected with any reservation; nor have I any friends that I know of who are. My attention was first called to this matter when I was a Member of the other House and by a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs there. I listened with a great deal of interest to the things which the now Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] and others had to say at that time, which compelled me to believe that perhaps there was not the best, the most economical, and the most honest administration of some of the Indian affairs.

I know very little about Mrs. Gray, but it is not true, if I understand the testimony correctly, that she has made no specific charges, for she has. Neither is it true that every investigation which has been made on that reservation has given a clean bill of health to the administration of affairs. For instance, I notice one very recent report by Inspector Holcomb, I think, which was to the effect that he discovered on the Crow Reservation a man in the employ of the United States Government who, under the law, was forbidden to have any dealings with the Indians in the nature of purchasing their lands, and so forth; that he married an Indian woman, or one adopted by that tribe, and she had property dealings with the Indians while her husband was agent or superintendent, and that she had acquired considerable property. The inspector condemned this as being an improper thing to do and recommended that the offender be reprimanded and assigned to some other Indian reservation. Mrs. Gray makes specific charges. She brings up charges in reference to the Huntley village site, to which the Senator from Montana calls attention, and brings some certificates from there, showing that certain Indians had located claims where Huntley now is, and that these claims are legal, although the Indians are fraudulently deprived of them, and that these lands so claimed by the Indians are worth many thousands of dollars.

Furthermore, Mr. President, it is true, as the Senator says, that these investigations have been made by the Department of the Interior for the last five years. Whenever Mrs. Gray has been put upon the stand or has appeared before committees, she has been cross-examined unmercifully, and the records will disclose that the attempt seemed to be to convict her of something rather than to investigate the particular charges to which she had called specific attention.

My reason for introducing this resolution was because I believed that the Department of Justice, having an organized force which has been investigating the White Earth Reservation in Minnesota and the Pima Indian Reservation in Arizona, has accomplished much and is well equipped to do the proposed work, and I have asked that this resolution be passed authorizing that department to proceed, and I have done this without any intention to reflect upon any person or department of the Government. I would simply authorize the other departments to turn over to the Attorney General such papers, records, and information as might have a bearing upon this matter.

The committee proceeded to have hearings on this resolution, and proceeded for several days, having much difficulty in getting a quorum, but finally it was determined that, on account of the criminations and recriminations which were indulged in back and forth before the committee and the difficulties of securing records, and so forth, it would be better to end the hearings and turn it over to the Attorney General for proper investigation, if he shall see fit to make it. Sufficient evidence, however, was received by the committee to warrant this report. It is true, possibly, that only a few Members were actually present when the report was authorized. I do not remember just how many were there, but a constructive quorum was at least present. I understand that the pending resolution was presented to the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs on a poll, and that a majority of the committee voted to report it favorably. It is properly before the Senate.

I feel it will be a great mistake, if, after all that has occurred in reference to these investigations, this resolution shall not be speedily adopted. It is due to the Department of the Interior, it is due to everybody connected with it, that a proper investigation be made of these charges, for they are charges. There are specific charges to the effect that in the administration of the affairs of the Crow Indians in Montana great fraud has been practiced upon those Indians. Mrs. Gray charges that the rolls of the Interior Department have not been properly kept. As corroborating that at the last hearing, the Department of the Interior brought before the committee what purported to be Schedule B, if I recall it—either A, B, or C—which the gentleman in charge, Mr. Holcomb, said he was not able to find at the other hearing, but finally he found it in the archives of the department somewhere, and that paper, which purported to be the record of allotments of the Indians, amounting to millions of dollars in value, was the kind of a paper that a man would expect to find if he had carried the roll around in his hip pocket for months in the summer time. It was almost illegible. No permanent record was there, and anyone could carry this paper away in his pocket.

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that after all the investigations and hearings that have been had it is the part of wisdom that the department, which is organized to investigate these things and to prosecute them, should proceed to determine whether or not there is anything wrong. If there is something wrong, then Congress and the country ought to know it; and if there is nothing wrong, then that also should be disclosed, and thus put an end to these charges, which will never be terminated until a full, fair, and complete investigation has been had.

Personally I say to Senators upon my honor, after having investigated the subject quite carefully, I believe that there are things in connection with Crow Indians which ought to be investigated. There are men who have been connected with the Indian department who have been discharged and are no longer officially connected with it, who are able to get information from the department which others not so familiar with records there can not obtain.

I do not now want to reflect upon the Interior Department. I know that the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fisher, must necessarily rely upon people under him; he must rely on those who get in touch with these things from the outside; and these men, or some of them, are included among the offenders in the charges submitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I am profoundly impressed with the conviction that our duty to our Indian wards has not been completely fulfilled. Their affairs from the very nature of things offer a great opportunity for the corrupt and the conscienceless, and we will fall far short of our full duty if we longer postpone what is clearly our obligation to do. Certainly enough has been presented to put us on notice, and no honest man can be hurt by a disclosure of the true situation in reference to the Crow Reservation.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan what specific thing or wrong does he want investigated out there? Does he have any definite thing in view, or is this just a shotgun fire?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There are certain things in reference to the general question of allotments, the rights of descendants of dead Indians, and the actions of certain men interested as agents, which are specifically mentioned in that written statement which Mrs. Gray filed, and I think they ought to be investigated. There are many grave and specific charges before the committee. But, sir, I would not limit it. If, when the Department of Justice gets into this matter, it discovers that there are things which ought to be investigated, I want it to go to the limit. I do not believe that the Department of Justice will proceed on a cold track and simply for the purpose of conducting "a shotgun investigation." I believe that we owe it to ourselves that this investigation be made.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator have in mind any special wrongdoing which he wants investigated on the Crow Reservation?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have mentioned certain matters. I can repeat them if the Senator wants me to do so.

Mr. DIXON. I was unable to get any definite information.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can recall the two Indians whose claims were presented to the committee, one of them relating to the Huntley village site——

Mr. DIXON. I heard the statement which the Senator made about the rolls. The Senator charges that the rolls were kept in some unsafe place. Is the Senator aware that whenever an Indian reservation is surveyed, there is a plat book kept here in the Land Office showing by quarter sections the Indian allotments, and there are other plat books kept upon the reservation and in the Indian Office showing absolutely every Indian's allotment, the same as in the United States Land Office, so that there could be no misconstruction.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that there should be such a roll kept.

Mr. DIXON. Did the Senator hear the chief inspector of the Indian Office say that the plat books were down here in the Land Office? Is the Senator aware of the fact that in Schedule B are the signatures—not copies, but the originals—of the three men who made the treaty with the Indians in 1891?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I saw all of that and that is why I am interested.

Mr. DIXON. Has the Senator read the hearing we had five years ago, which is embraced in a great big book of 800 pages?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will not say that I have read all of that.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator recall the awful wrong which we investigated about Joe Cooper, a "white" Indian, a half-breed, who was alleged to have been starved and wronged and persecuted? This much-wronged Indian, this martyr, as Mrs. Gray made him out to be before the committee, was brought down here, and it turned out on the hearing that Cooper and his children had had allotted to them over 1,800 acres of irrigated land. It was developed that Joe Cooper, the martyr, as Mrs. Gray had held him out to the committee, this much-wronged Indian, living there for 20 years, had cultivated not to exceed 1 acre of this 1,800 acres of irrigated land, and that the house in which he had lived and which the Government agent had given him free of charge, he had burned for firewood? I am simply citing cases which she retailed here five years ago in listing the great wrongs of the Crow Indians. Joe Cooper, the "white" Indian, was one of them, and the main charge at that time was in relation to him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state, Mr. President, that I am not making my statement upon an intimate knowledge of all of the previous investigations, but I have talked with members of the committee who were then in the Senate and who were convinced by those previous times that no sufficient investigation had been made. I repeat, with these charges pending and with the charge the Senator suggests, that men have been condemned in a wholesale manner by this woman—she makes some exceptions. There is no escape for us, it seems to me, from the duty to proceed under this resolution and have an investigation made.

Mr. DIXON. I only desire to ask the Senator one other question. Is the Senator aware that Secretary Garfield investigated the Crow Reservation; that Secretary Ballinger, with his inspectors, investigated it; and that Secretary Fisher, with his inspectors, has investigated the Crow Reservation? Is the Senator aware that, in addition to the fact that three Secretaries of the Interior, with their whole force of special agents, have investigated the Crow Reservation, Commissioner Leupp, with his inspectors, investigated it; that Commissioner Valentine, under this continuous agitation as to the Crow Reservation, investigated it with his inspectors; and that the present Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Abbott, went there personally and made an investigation?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am aware of all that, and think I have so stated.

Mr. DIXON. Is the Senator aware that all these Government officials reported that the Crow Reservation was on a par with all the other Indian reservations in the West and that there was nothing in the charges made by this woman, who professes to be a newspaper correspondent?

Mr. TOWNSEND. With the statement of facts as stated by the Senator I can not agree. Those are matters which will be disclosed; but I do know that this woman has been persecuted relentlessly every time she has sought to bring conditions to official attention. I do know that she claims—and she shows pretty good authority for her statement—that she was to go out there under the administration of Secretary Garfield to look into these matters. I know, as a result of her activities, that before she got through she served time in jail and was accused of being insane, but was discharged, and that she was treated with all kinds of indignity, which she says was due to the fact that she was trying to disclose things that some of her persecutors were interested in. That may not be true; but if it is not true, it will be disclosed by a proper investigation, and in no other manner can the truth be known.

Mr. DIXON. I made a suggestion to the committee the other morning, which I will renew to the Senate. The lawyer who defended her after she was arrested after a year out there is T. J. Walsh, one of the best lawyers in my State, who will succeed me on the floor of the Senate on the 4th of March. I suggested that we wait until Mr. Walsh came here and took his oath of office; and as he was her attorney, if he should then say this investigation ought to be made, I would be perfectly happy to have it made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator advise me what his objection is to this investigation?

Mr. DIXON. Simply because this woman for five years has been appearing in the newspaper headlines, and she has caused the expenditure, I think, of $25,000—that, I think, would be the minimum expenditure which she has caused.

Mr. TOWNSEND. She is not unique in her position as a "headliner."

Mr. TOWNSEND subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with the discussion on Senate resolution 352 the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] suggested that no specific charges had been made by Mrs. Gray. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in connection with my remarks this morning the printed statement of Mrs. Gray, made before the Indian Affairs Committee on January 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF MRS. HELEN PIERCE GRAY.

Mrs. GRAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will say in the beginning that I am going over some of the ground that some of the older members of the committee know probably too much about, but some of the newer members have asked me so many questions that I thought it would be better to go back so that they will fully understand the situation.

In 1906 I was associated with the Byles News Bureau at Omaha, Nebr., which was receiving the news service of the Omaha Bee. My business was to prepare special articles on western topics. To get data I often worked with the land departments of different railways, the Reclamation Service in the West, private irrigating and mining companies, and anyone interested in the development of western lands and resources. The return of Buffalo Bill's party from Europe to Cody, Wyo., the center of an irrigation district to be watered by the Shoshone Dam and Corbett Tunnel, gave opportunity for special stories concerning this district, introduced and featured with his picturesque personality. I collected a large amount of data and wanted to get away by myself to write it up. The nearby Crow Reservation was promising, and I went there. I secured a room in the boys' dormitory of the Government Indian School, and took meals with the teachers. Notice of the conditions of the school was impressed on me. I talked with Supt. Creel; the doctor; Reynolds, the agent; and the teachers, of the horrible eye disease that affected nearly every child, and a throat affection on the neck under the jaws. I noticed the matron washed all children in the same water, used one flesh brush for all, though the diseased eye and throat sores were discharging. When five years ago I told this story before this committee my statement so shocked the members of the committee that I fear it discredited many of the other things I then said. Investigations afterwards showed that I minimized the facts. This eye disease is trachoma. The gland disease, lumpy jaw.

Later I went back 30 miles to an Indian home on the Little Big Horn. Engaged in my writing, I found whenever I went out of doors Indians waiting to talk to me. They came in groups, two to five or six. They questioned me mainly about the conditions at Washington as to their property. I had never seen an Indian reservation before; knew nothing of Indians or Indian affairs, and never dreamed I was violating a law by telling them if they signed a 25-year lease for the entire reservation, which Commissioner Leupp was then promoting, they would probably come out paupers. I asked Agent Reynolds about this lease. He gave me the printed annual report of the commissioner for 1905–6, containing a statement under the heading of "Crow Indian sugar-beet project." I gave this to the Indians. Later they wanted to know more about this lease, but explained to me for the first time that the agent had threatened to arrest them if they talked to me any more about this business. They were willing to face imprisonment if only permitted to get the facts and save their people. They told me they had called a meeting of the Crow Indian lodge at an adjacent Indian's home and asked me if I were afraid to come to the house and meet the lodge and explain to them about the leases; that the older Indians did not understand what the returned students had explained, but that they would believe me. I went, but sent word to the agent, who had come to Lodgegrass to arrest them, that I wanted him present at the meeting. He sent word he would come, but did not.

They discussed the grazing leases; said they never received their money, though the land had been leased 35 years at $45,000 a year; that they were sure the lessors had very many more cattle and sheep on the reservation than they were paying for; that their stock trespassed on Indians' farms, so that the Indians had been obliged to give up farming; that lessors branded Indians' cattle as their own. They said that when the reservation was opened under the act of 1904 the Indians' allotments on the ceded portion should be protected; that they should receive $1,150,000 in cash and other things; that they had never received any money; that their allotments on the ceded portion had been taken away from them; that allotments had been made to Indians who had been dead for generations, and that the land so allotted has been sold; that there was such intimidation they believed that that night would be the only opportunity to discuss these matters. They were willing to suffer, but their children in the Government school had been tortured to bring the fathers to terms. We stayed until morning, and they told me of many other grievances. I was unspeakably shocked, and told them if they would take a petition to President Roosevelt I was certain he would put a stop to such conditions on the reservation. They said they had tried it, and it invariably ended in the agent dealing misery to everyone concerned. They begged me to go to Washington with them, and would raise the money and pay my expenses. They were in such a state of fear that I told them I would do everything I could to help them to put the matter before President Roosevelt in person. In the morning I was arrested by Agent Reynolds. He refused to tell me what I was arrested for; refused to let me communicate with anybody off the reservation. I was taken to Billings.

The agent told the Indians that I had been bought off. A number of them then started to Washington to carry out the plan. They were arrested and thrown into jail at Sheridan. I sent for the agent and told him that unless he released them I would telegraph the men's story all over the United States. Reynolds released the Indians; sent three of them to me in Billings, and we discussed the situation. They said that it would be impossible for them to leave the reservation, but gave me $300 for my expenses to go to Washington. I sent for Reynolds and told him what I was going to do, and his reply was that I would find that all the rights that the Indians had, or that I had was such as he chose to permit us. I told him I knew what he said was not true; that the Indians were American citizens and so was I. I have found Reynolds's statement, up to the present time, to be true. When I reached Washington I laid the case before President Roosevelt personally. The President directed that Commissioner Leupp give me access to the Crow records and furnish me with a stenographer and show me every courtesy in order that I might prepare a statement to accompany the petition that I brought for the Indians. I prepared such a statement. President Roosevelt spent some hours with me going over my statement and the petition of the Indians. He sent for the then Secretary, Garfield, to come to the White House. He put the statement in his hands, telling him to go over it with me very carefully; that he was going to handle the matter personally. It was arranged that Mr. Garfield's private secretary, Z. L. Dalby, should accompany me to the reservation and make an investigation along the lines that we had arranged. I told the President that I depended upon my writing for my living and had expected to use this story. But we agreed that, inasmuch as making it public would inform those whom we were to investigate, that I would not publish the story. Dalby and I were to spend the necessary time to look over records here. I then started west. I had waited in Chicago more than a month.

I wrote President Roosevelt that I had continual complaints from the Indians that their sheep as well as cattle were being taken off, thus cleaning up the reservation in advance of the investigation; that my promise of silence was solely on the condition that they keep silence and get to the investigation as soon as possible; that something like two months had already elapsed. I also asked that I be sent immediately a proper written commission to return to the reservation. In reply I received a letter from Secretary Garfield informing me that Mr. Dalby would start very shortly for the reservation, but he trusted that I would use none of the information that I had acquired for publication. I also received a letter from Commissioner Leupp, inclosing my authority to return to the reservation, and also a letter from Mr. Dalby explaining what he was doing to cause the delay. I replied that I was perfectly willing to keep silent, but was going to the reservation at once. In order to avoid any publicity on my return, I wired certain Indians to meet me at an out-of-the-way station. I was very much surprised the next night when Mr. Reynolds, in company with a number of other agency officials, came to the place where I was staying, telling me I was under arrest for returning to the reservation. I told him I had Mr. Leupp's permission to do so. He laughed and said he did not care anything about Mr. Leupp's permission, he had come there to arrest me. He compelled me to accompany him to the agency, about 30 miles distant, without adequate wraps, on a cold night. It was near midnight when we arrived. In the meantime I had nothing to eat.

The Indian court was in session to try my case, and Joe Cooper, president of the Crow Lodge, was in the guardhouse under arrest. They told me that I also was to be locked up in the guardhouse. This guardhouse was a cow shed and filthy beyond comprehension. It was one of the principal instruments for intimidation of the Indians. I warned Reynolds urgently against such a course, and he finally dismissed the court and telegraphed to Washington. I also telegraphed the Chicago Record-Herald, which was backing the investigation at the time, with the result that I was given a room at the hotel and released in the morning by order from Washington. However, I was ill and unable to leave my bed. Toward noon the hotel keeper, Fred Server, came to the door and told me under no circumstances to speak to anyone or to get up. He added that there were some things he could not stand for. About an hour afterwards Mr. Reynolds came to my room with a physician, and I discovered they were examining me as a lunatic. When they went out of the room I got up and found that they had a court in lunacy in session, the clerk acting as United States commissioner. Server secretly wired to Sheridan for a physician. The physician's arrival in the afternoon ended the proceedings in lunacy, and I accompanied him back to Sheridan, where I received a telegram that Mr. Dalby was starting from Washington. On Dalby's arrival he requested that I should remain in Sheridan while he went to the reservation and began the investigation. I consented, remaining there several days.

The residents warned me that Dalby was in continual conference with the gang on the reservation and it would be unsafe for me to go. I wired Dalby he must permit me to come to the reservation at once or I should abandon our plan. He came to Sheridan and agreed that if I would wait several days he would be ready to begin the investigation with me. I did so, starting at the time agreed upon. The Indians came to the train as it reached the reservation and told me that certain petitioners for the investigation had been arrested. I went to the agency, sent for Dalby, and asked him about the arrest. He said he had nothing to do with it. I introduced him to the Indians. He told them that he had come to make a thorough investigation, with their petition and my charges as the basis. They expressed relief and started out at once to summon the Indians, with his consent, to a council to meet him at Lodge Grass. It was raining and nearly dark; some of the Indians would have to ride 200 miles, but they started out at once in high hopes. I returned to my former stopping place on the Little Big Horn. Dalby set a time for the council which gave the Indians barely time to assemble. As Dalby progressed, he told them he would not have anything to do with them unless they dismissed me and had me arrested for interfering. This was against the wishes of the Indians. I was roughly handled. Dalby told the Indians my arrest was by the President's order, to show what he thought of me. He also showed them telegrams and letters that I had written to the President, saying that everything had been turned over to him. Dalby ordered Alex Upshaw to search my trunk. He did so, taking such papers as seemed to be wanted. I was then expelled from the reservation without money and without my baggage. Fortunately, a cattleman who knew Reynolds was at the station and urged me to accept a loan of $50, which I thankfully did. It was five days before I could get my baggage. Dalby then investigated by himself, threatening some and buying others.

Then Secretary Garfield came to Montana and opened the Huntley irrigation project. Continuing as a writer, I went to Billings. I found there the reservation ring in force, and that it would be impossible for me to go to Huntley. However, I went to Denver, to the lands convention, meeting Secretary Garfield and Mr. Pinchot there. Later I returned to Montana. Meantime I had written to magazine editors in New York of conditions on Crow, and had been asked to come to New York to handle the story. I started, by way of Billings. When I changed trains at Billings I was arrested while buying my ticket to New York, on charge of returning to the reservation after I had been put off. I was taken to the station. While I was sitting in the common room there, some man, who appeared to be a gentleman, and known to the officials, came and said that I would be more comfortable in a smaller room where I was to wait. A man was in this smaller room. He proved to be a United States commissioner, and I discovered the first man was conducting a hearing before him on my case. When I made this discovery I found the door locked. I threatened to open the window and call for help if he did not desist; said I wanted a lawyer, and I wanted to know what they were doing. This hearing was postponed; I was put under $500 bail, which some unknown person put up in cash. Meanwhile Dalby and Reynolds arrived from the reservation and made additional charges against me of having entered into a contract with restricted Indians without the consent of the Secretary. I was bound over to the grand jury and kept in jail in Helena, incommunicado, for nearly four months, until I managed to get bail. A petition for writ of habeas corpus was denied by Federal Judge Hunt, now of the Commerce Court here, by whom it was heard perfunctorily. After I got out of jail the cattlemen got together and started a paper in Billings, which was purchased by one of the lessors on the reservation, Charley Bair, for the purpose of preventing further publicity.

When the grand jury met they completely exonerated me. I came at once to Washington and had a hearing before this committee, which was reported in Senate Document 445, parts 1 and 2, Sixtieth Congress, first session. The result of the hearing was that the Senate ordered an investigation and made appropriations for the same. The Senate refused to confirm Dalby's appointment as Indian inspector until in August, 1909, at which time he was confirmed on condition that he would immediately resign from the service. Dalby did resign, but immediately returned to Washington as attorney for the very lessors on the Crow Reservation whom he had been sent to investigate, and whose conduct he had whitewashed in his report. Near midnight of March 3, 1909, the original resolution making the appropriation was rescinded by Senator Kean. The following year the House Indian Committee unanimously asked for an investigation, but, being near the end of the session, no appropriation was made. As the result of my first efforts, some of the conditions on the reservation were remedied and the income from the leases was increased from $45,000 to $150,000. Numerous pretended investigations have been made by officials of the Interior Department, all of which, in effect, whitewashed the conditions and protected the people engaged in looting the Indians.

The resolution which your committee is now considering is for the purpose of having an actual investigation by the Department of Justice.

ALLOTMENTS.

This is what I found: Allotments originally made, which had been for years enjoyed and upon which some cultivation had been made in each instance, and in many instances where the Indian owners had died and left heirs, were summarily and fraudulently canceled. The Indians were persuaded or driven from them if living, and if dead the allotments switched to their heirs on lands in a different locality, provided such heirs agreed in advance to sell to interested parties; but if the legal heirs were unwilling to sell, bogus heirs were substituted for the real ones.

Down on the Yellowstone there were some 300 or 400 Indians allotted. Under the act of 1882 these allotments were approved. In 1904 one John Rankin began allotting. The Indians were told that their allotments were not good, and he canceled many of them, although the Indians had been making these allotments their homes for years and had built irrigation ditches there. Some of these allotments were worth as much as $25,000 each. The Interior Department canceled these Yellowstone allotments where the Indians had died. Mr. Rankin reallotted the dead Indian to very choice land west of the Big Horn when sure the new allotments would be sold. New family rolls were prepared in such a way that the purported heirs to this land were those who would agree to sell it. These allottees on the Yellowstone have been subjected to every form of intimidation conceivable. Some of them are still holding on. Some of the allotments have been canceled within the past two or three years without any shadow of authority for having done so.

Second. Indians who had been allotted to the land where the Huntley irrigation project is, and to the land that is now covered by the Two Leggings ditch, had their allotments arbitrarily canceled. They were given new allotments under their protest on the diminished reservation, anywhere the students could be put in, the best land having been taken up.

Third. Indians whose allotments were on the diminished reservation were tricked into relinquishing the old allotments in such a way that they seemed to have taken a new allotment in 1904.

Fourth. Indians who had held allotments were forcibly removed and taken to community farms, compelling them in effect to abandon their old allotments. After this was done the irrigated allotments were cut down arbitrarily and without any legislative act from 160 acres to 80 and 40 acres. This irrigated land did not come under any reclamation project, but the irrigation had been put in with the money of the Crow Indians, received in payment for land.

Fifth. The rolls also have been padded fraudulently by the insertion of many employees on the reservation, with their families. These were thereby given the right to deal in Indian lands and the right to buy Indian allotments without competition and in private. All this is strictly contrary to that provision of the criminal code of the United States forbidding officers of the Indian service or Interior Department officials from dealing in Indian or public lands. The rolls have been further falsified by dropping the names of many Crow Indians who heretofore had valuable allotments. The rolls are further deficient in the fact that many children born since 1899 have not been enrolled for allotment, though there remains in the neighborhood of 2,000,000 acres of surplus land.

TRIBAL ROLLS.

The original rolls showing these allotment frauds have disappeared. The law says specifically that they shall be kept intact in Crow Agency and in Washington. To a proper investigating party I will show that this had not been done. When Commissioner Valentine was shown the discrepancy in the rolls he ordered the old rolls to be produced. After a diligent search the rolls were not found, and those whose duty it was to know about the rolls said they have been taken care of and they were not produced. At Crow Agency I found that the Crow land book, which is the old Crow rolls, had also disappeared. It could not be found. There are papers existent, some of which I have, that will demonstrate the falsity of the newly manufactured roll and the importance to the Interior Department of procuring certain attorneys to be attorneys for the Crow Indians and the desirability of the passage of certain legislation, approved by the Interior Department, designed to ratify and confirm the present roll and to destroy the rights of the Crow Indians to recover their allotments and other rights. These new rolls consist of three large books, which were placed in the hands of the Department of Justice by Commissioner Valentine's direction, to have them examined with a view of investigating and setting forth these frauds. It was with reference to the possession of these rolls that I was arrested last summer on the order of Assistant Secretary Adams.

GRAZING AND AGRICULTURAL LEASES.

There is in the neighborhood of 3,000,000 acres on Crow Reservation. The entire reservation is particularly fine grazing land. When Senator Teller was Secretary of the Interior, about 35 years ago, the surplus land on Crow Reservation, which then included the Yellowstone country, was leased for about $45,000 a year to stockmen. In 1906, when I met the Indians at their Crow Indian lodge meeting, they complained very bitterly that the cattle and sheep men occupied the reservation to their exclusion, and were paying very little for the privilege, some of them nothing, and that what money they did pay the Indians never saw. In the hearing before this committee it was established that the leases were not given to the highest bidders. That was proven to be a fact when the leases were made the next time. One lease to Frank Henry was especially discussed. He was paying that year $1,800 for his privileges. After Mr. Dalby's retirement as Indian inspector he appeared at the Indian Office as attorney for Frank Henry, and submitted a plan under which Henry voluntarily offered to pay $48,000 for the land he formerly obtained for $1,800. Higher bids then submitted, which the Indians wanted to accept, were refused in the Indian Office, all of which investigation will demonstrate. The lessors on Crow formed a ring of men who are acquiring the reservation, oppressing the Indians in every possible manner, and violating the law constantly. They are not checked by the officials at the agency, but the officials protect the lessors from the Indians and the Indians are thus left to their despoilers. The leases in almost every instance are let on the basis of per capita payment of live stock. There is no data at the agency to show how many head of stock are turned on under any lease or what are added.

The Indians complain that their own cattle and horses have been starved to death; that the lessors have branded their calves and colts, thus stealing them; that they have no protection against the cattle and the sheep of the lessors, which, as the Indians wrote me, were trampling them to death. These leases include the portion that was set aside for grazing the Indians' cattle, known as the I–D Range. Formerly this land had never been leased and the Indians bitterly opposed it, as they have no other place for their own stock. To force the lease upon them, a business committee was appointed by the agent, a council was called; the agent wrote Commissioner Abbott he could not get consent from a general council; Chief Supervisor of Schools Holcomb was sent there to deal with this so-called business committee. The leases of this range had already been illegally approved by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. Adams, the minutes of the council had been prepared in advance in Washington by Assistant Commissioner Abbott. Chief Supervisor Holcomb procured the signatures of the agent, the business council, and other necessary officers to these spurious council proceedings, and sent them all to Washington with his official sanction. The Crow Indians, being cattlemen, bitterly object to sheep on the reservation as they bring the loco weed and destroy the range. Nevertheless, large portions of the reservation was let to sheep and the sheep are permitted in portions of the reservation where there is no lease. The Indians' individual allotments are included in these grazing leases and they are prevented from acquiring possession of their own allotted lands which would be the only possible source of income they have. As a result the Indians are driven to eating the diseased beef which the lessors sell in violation of law at $15 a head. This disease is known technically as lumpy jaw. So deadly to the cattle and so contagious is it that there is a statute forbidding its interstate transportation and directing that the animals affected shall be slaughtered and buried. Instead of this, these lumpy-jawed cattle are sold to the Indians on the reservation and also to the Indian Government school. I am confident that real investigation will show not only on Crow, but nearly every other Indian reservation where there are cattle, that what is called a form of tuberculosis is, in fact, lumpy jaw.

As to agricultural leases: There is a large amount of very valuable irrigated land. More than $1,000,000 of Crow money was used putting in this system. When the allotments were fraudulently canceled much of this was taken from the Indians and termed surplus land. This land, under some alleged law, which I can not find, is being leased for agricultural purposes. Indians owning this irrigated land can not get the water from their own water systems and are compelled to lease. It is leased only to the ring for sums that are ridiculously small, in terms which permit the lessor to cut timber without building houses, to beyond that the Indians tell me they seldom see the price actually mine the coal on the land without any recompense to the Indians, and fixed for compensation; it disappears somewhere. On account of these conditions, young Indians returning from school have no land, and when they seek to lease lands belonging even to their own families they are prevented from doing so. Leases made by Indians to returning students are disapproved by the Interior Department. In this way the young educated Indian, both woman and man, who comes back from school has no possible means of support, and become the prey of the land and agency rings or returns to the blanket.

IRRIGATION.

On Crow there are two large rivers, the Big Horn and the Little Big Horn. There are also smaller streams—Soap Creek, Warm Springs, Lodge Grass, Pass Creek, and Pryor Creek. The land lying under these streams is mostly flat and can be irrigated easily without dams by mere diversion ditches. The Indians complain bitterly that private ditches are taken out by white men without authority. In particular, this is true of the Two Leggings ditch and the Pass Creek ditch. Prior to the year 1909 certain white men who had no authority to do so and could not obtain it properly took their chances and built a ditch 34 miles long, 50 feet wide, from the Big Horn River right across the allotted Indians' land, that would water the land through which it passed on the diminished reservation. This unlawful act was permitted by the Indian agent. It supplied also water to land taken by the act of 1904, in which, to the knowledge of some members of this committee, a forged power of attorney was used to procure the consent of Congress to the passage of the act. Those using the power of attorney now buy the land. The Indians whose land was crossed by this ditch have been asking relief from the oppression of these trespassers. Inspector Holcomb was sent to Crow Reservation and practically reported that the ditch did not cross the lands of certain complaining Indians. The facts show that his report was incorrect. The Indians also complained that these trespassers cut their large timber and had not built bridges over the ditch; that they had taken possession of their houses and of their lands and that the Indians could not get water to cultivate such portions of their land as might be left to them. These Indians are asking investigations and protection.

In the spring of 1912 these white trespassers were in Washington seeking the approval by the Interior Department of their trespassing ditch and other iniquities on Crow Reservation. A concerted attempt was made to accomplish this purpose, which included personal attacks on myself from high sources, and in spite of my protests and the petition signed by every Indian under the ditch, the trespassers accomplished their purpose in the Interior Department. The ditch was approved and the order of the House of Representatives ordering an investigation and making appropriations therefor was nullified.

The Two Leggings ditch is in the western extremity of the reservation. In the eastern extremity is another ditch almost identical in character, put in by the Spear Bros. and others. This ditch takes the water from Pass Creek and crosses many Indian allotments. It can not be less than 20 miles in length and may be as much as 40. It waters lands that have been acquired from the Indians by the lessors in such a manner that the Indians claim they have been defrauded in different ways; one way, of which they complain most bitterly, is that the location of their allotments has been changed so that where they supposed their land lay on the bottom of a valley they find it is on a bench where no water can reach it. The land the Indians claim has passed to the lessors. Pass Creek is one of the principal tributaries of the Little Big Horn. Diverting the water through the Pass Creek ditch has so lowered the water of the Little Big Horn that the irrigation system of the Indians, depending upon this river, is deficient in water. Another thing is the expenditure of money for irrigation. The income from the grazing leases, which is tribal money, is about $150,000 a year. Nearly all of this money is expended for irrigation. It will be readily seen from irrigation maps of Crow Reservation that the money is being expended to irrigate lands that belong to white men and not to Indians, including the land of very many of the employees of the reservation, whose land has been obtained in defiance of the criminal laws.

There is also the money from the sale of ceded land. This expenditure is specifically provided for by act of Congress. This act is disregarded.

I have now made an outline statement of a portion of the evils that are in existence to-day on Crow Reservation, protected and fostered by the Interior Department. This protection is given in different ways. But it amounts to this: That any Indian or white person who attempts to interfere with such graft is subjected to any form of intimidation that may appear to be most effective in the instance. The intimidation is exercised in different ways. One has been by calling out soldiers and shooting the Indians or arresting them. Another is by sending inspectors who will carry out the desires of the grafters—such men as Mr. Dalby, Holcomb, and McLaughlin, who have been before this committee.

On an Indian reservation the agent has power of life and death over the Indian. If an Indian attempts to appeal above the agent, he must do it through the agent. If he succeed in attracting the attention of any one above the agent, it is customary to send to the reservation an inspector or supervisor. If the Indian makes any formal charges to the inspector or supervisor against the agent, he must do it in the presence of the agent, who has power of life and death not only over him but over his family, including even his little children, who are in Government schools, any of whom may be subjected to torture in various forms. When I reported to President Roosevelt in 1906 the conditions I found in the Crow Reservation Mr. Z. Louis Dalby was sent out to investigate them.

Dalby's report, which is on file in the Indian Office, admitted the truth of many of the charges I made, but whitewashed the grafters entirely. Dalby's report was accepted by the Interior Department as gospel, but the Senate, on learning of his conduct, refused to confirm his appointment as Indian inspector, except on condition that he resign. This Dalby did, and in less than three weeks after his resignation he blossomed out as attorney before the Interior Department for the very grafters he had been sent to investigate and whom he had whitewashed and which fought so valiantly for his confirmation. And he has ever since been the favored son of the Interior Department, and has been able to accomplish more as the attorney for the ring on the Crow Reservation than he would have been able to accomplish had he remained inspector, being apparently in entire control of the situation. When it was found that Mr. Dalby had been put in control of other Indian reservations in the same manner, charges setting forth the history of his conduct on Crow Reservation were filed with the Interior Department looking toward his disbarment from practice. Acting Secretary Adams himself peremptorily ordered that these charges be dismissed and that no investigation of them be had. Secretary Ballinger visited the reservation, and after looking into the situation ordered an investigation. Jack Munroe made the investigation and submitted a report, which was suppressed by the Interior Department. Chief Supervisor E. P. Holcomb was the next to investigate. He ignored very many of the charges of the Indians and eulogized and exonerated not only Agent Reynolds but the other officials on the reservation. Other inspectors and supervisors have been to Crow Reservation and have made reports, of which I have heard but none of which I have read. The Secretary of the Interior has stated that a report was recently made of these conditions by Inspector Norris, but that this report was confidential and that I could not have access to it. Concerning these pretended investigations, it need only be said that practically nothing has been done by the Interior Department to remedy the conditions that have existed for years on Crow Reservation.

Another form of protecting the evils on the reservation is through the use of attorneys who are willing to carry out the iniquity of the Indian Bureau. One firm of attorneys in Washington, also favorite sons of the Interior Department, procured a contract from a delegation of Crow Indians while these Indians were in a state of intoxication, by the terms of which contract this firm was to become the tribal attorneys for them and represent them in presenting large claims against the Government. The conduct of this firm of attorneys in this matter was called to the attention of the Acting Secretary of the Interior Department. Charges sworn to in part by a former United States Senator, and sworn to entirely by myself, were submitted to him, but he refused to investigate them or call witnesses. At the same time he was urging this same firm upon the Osage Indians as their tribal attorneys. One of the most potent instruments of fraud is the business committee and tribal council. It is the custom of the Interior Department to appoint these councils and delegations in such a manner that the interests of the grafters will be represented rather than the interests of the Indians. Another way is by the use of money or its equivalent. This includes the preparation by Government officials in Washington, in advance, of the minutes of councils intended to be held on the reservations.

Mr. DIXON. And, as I have said, the matter has already been investigated by three successive Secretaries of the Interior, by three Commissioners of the Indian Office, with all their force of inspectors, and also by the Indian Rights Association. I say to the Senator from Michigan that if there was anything wrong there which needed investigation, certainly the Indian Rights Association would have added their request that this investigation be made for the eighth time.

While the reservation happens to be in my State, it is 400 miles from where I live. I will not interpose any objection to and I shall not vote against the resolution, but I think the United States Senate is being made a cat's-paw for a self-exploiting individual.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I should like to take just one moment, or a little less, on this question. I was on the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body during the first session I was here, and perhaps also the second. Mrs. Gray appeared before that committee; she testified and attempted to give that committee a great deal of information regarding the subject matter of the proposed investigation. I can not to-day recall the charges which Mrs. Gray made, because I have not given the subject any attention or thought since that time, and I know nothing about how the agency is now being conducted or what has occurred there, but I do know of facts, which, under the circumstances, I think I ought to tell the Senate, because it has been stated here that Secretary Garfield's department investigated the Crow Agency and the charges made by Mrs. Gray. Secretary Garfield sent there one of his Indian inspectors by the name of Dalby to investigate the charges Mrs.

Gray made. She had gone to the Department of the Interior, Mr. Garfield then being Secretary of the Interior, and did not get any assurance there that there would be any investigation, and she went to President Roosevelt, and as the result of that visit an investigation was ordered. When Mr. Dalby appeared on the Crow Reservation upon the first day that the investigation began he had Mrs. Gray arrested. He was there to investigate the charges which she had made. She was present to assist in the investigation. She was almost immediately arrested at the instance of Mr. Dalby, soon removed from the reservation, and incarcerated in jail, where she remained for some time. So she was not even permitted to make good, if she could, the charges she had made, and there was, as stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], great hostility shown her.

Now, if what has been done in the subsequent investigations by Secretary Ballinger and Secretary Fisher is of the same character as that conducted by Secretary Garfield, I say some investigation by some branch of this Government ought to be made, and made speedily.

There is another thing I want to say, Mr. President, and that is I opposed the confirmation of Mr. Dalby when he was reappointed Indian inspector, because of his conduct, as stated by me. His nomination was held up for some time, and he would not have been confirmed, as I understood before it took place, if he had not given assurance to some Members of this body that he would resign as soon as his confirmation took place; and I was advised that immediately after his confirmation he did resign.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I make a statement in a matter of personal privilege.

On the 26th of October last there was published in the newspaper El Cronista, in Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras, a false and fabricated pretended speech alleged to have been made by me regarding the relations between the United States and Central and South America. I send to the desk a translation of this pretended speech, and will ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my statement, without detaining the Senate by reading it in full.

[Translation of pretended speech falsely attributed to Senator ROOT.]

[El Cronista, Tegucigalpa, Oct. 26, 1912—No. 60.]

ELIHU ROOT BEFORE LATIN AMERICA.

The following paragraphs of a recent speech of Mr. ROOT, United States Senator, ex-Secretary of State, and one of the most eminent personages of the Yankee country, ought to be known in Central America.

As follows:

"Our position in the Western Hemisphere is unique and without example in modern history. This Nation is a greater and nobler Rome, placed by God to act as arbitrator, not only in the destinies of all America, but also in Europe and Asia, through its natural resources and industrial products which supply the world. The English and German Armies are fed with the meat which we send them. The supplies which Europe buys of us it could not obtain in any other world market if our exportation were suspended.

"Our manifest destiny as controller of the destinies of all America is a fact so inevitable and logical that only the means which we should employ in order to arrive at this end are left to be discussed; but no one doubts our mission and our intention to fulfill it, or, what is more significant, of our power to accomplish it.

"In the second half of the twentieth century they who study the map will be very surprised that we should have 'waited so long' to round out the natural frontiers of our territory to the Panama Canal, and on the other side, to the Southern Continent, and that in the same manner (haya pasado con las Antillas todas, como en el viejo mundo, de no haberse encontrado el nuevo) the same should have happened to all the Antilles as happened in the Old World—that is, not to have discovered the New World, with the difference that we have no need of a Columbus, but rather of a simple joint resolution of our Congress.

"It is a question of time when Mexico, Central America, and the islands which we still lack in the Caribbean Sea shall fall beneath our flag. When the Panama Canal is open it would be as insufficient to place a sentinel only in Porto Rico, without doing the same in Cuba, as if a man tied one arm in order to row, or a lady to put in one earring to adorn herself for a feast.

"Not long ago the Porto Rican delegates, headed by the representative of that island, who has a seat in our Congress, but does not vote, visited me in order that I, as president of the committee on Latin America affairs, should inform them what policy we proposed to follow in Porto Rico, and I expressed myself more or less as follows:

"I told them that I have been, and always shall be, opposed to granting North American citizenship to the Porto Ricans, as well as to other Latin Americans who, for inevitable reasons, pass under our control. I believe that it would be prejudicial for both parties.

"As this desired citizenship from the outset would have to be understood in autonomous form, once granted greater discontent would not be long in following, maintaining that as citizens they are not equal to those of the Union.

"The granting of citizenship implies many other things and is clothed with uncertainty; and in any case it is too much to ask that we compromise ourselves for the Antilles with their handful of millions of inhabitants whose race, civilization, aspirations, and customs are not only distinct, but even antagonistic to ours.

"I told them that they were, after all, Latins, and as such, although the inheritors of glorious historic and artistic traditions and possessed of great domestic virtue and instruction, above all in abstract sciences, and a disposition for the arts, as Latins, I repeat, they understood citizenship and other fundamental principles in a different way to the Saxons; and as these principles are judged by results, we are right and they are wrong. With the Latin Americans there does not exist, nor can we have anything in common, if we accept the good will which we mutually profess, but great as are these good wishes, they do not suffice to fill the gulf which separates us.

"The United States augments in population, riches, and importance daily, and we can with difficulty take care of our own affairs, but being the case, 'why complicate our task with new lodgers in the house, as the Latin Americans converted into citizens of our great Nation can not help but be?'

"I understand and confess that we are governing badly in Porto Rico, as we governed badly in Cuba the second time. But though we may do it badly we shall always do it better than the natives. In the Philippines, where our rule has been more strict, the results have been admirable. And the Porto Ricans, Cubans, and Filipinos should be convinced of the fact that, since our experience with the annexation of Hawaii, we will not repeat the expedient of citizenship.

"If it were possible for these Latin America nationalities to understand 'self-control' and 'self-government,' as is the case with our northern neighbors, then Pan Americanism would be a beautiful reality, without necessitating our learning to command in Spanish; but can they or do they know how to govern themselves? Let Haiti say; let Mexico say; let Colombia, Panama, Nicaragua, and, above all, Cuba, twice instructed by us, watched diplomatically since and whose present economical disorganization is as disastrous as in the colonial epochs, say. In the hands of these people is their fate; but I doubt whether it will be good, unless it is beneath our protectorate.

"Did not the North American Government find itself on the eve of change to replace the present administration or to confirm it in power, no one would deny that in these hours we would have already solved the Mexican and Central American complication and given special attention to the economical affairs of the Great Antilla (Cuba). And whoever speaks of national finances, speaks of all the Government and national system. Fortunately, and soon, we shall reach a tragical position, since 'alea jacta est,' and whoever of the three candidates occupies the White House, as they are of one opinion regarding foreign policy and, above all, expansion in America, the country can trust in the Congress, which with hands free will know how to second the Chief of State, as in 1812, 1845, 1861, and 1898."

This pretended speech contains most arrogant and offensive statements as to the relations which do and should exist between the United States and the Latin-American countries of these continents. I have denied over my own signature the authenticity of this speech, and my denial has been published in Tegucigalpa. I should let the matter rest there were it not that this pretended speech is being published all over Central and South America, and that some years ago, while Secretary of State, I made a visit to South America and represented the United States in many expressions of friendship toward the people of the Latin-American countries. Owing to this and to the fact that I am still connected with the Government of the United States, these expressions in this pretended speech are being treated by the people of Latin America as indicating either a change in the attitude of the people of the United States or insincerity in the former expressions of friendship.

I send to the desk and ask to have the Secretary read one illustration of the way in which this paper is being used. It is an extract from an editorial published in the newspaper El Fonografa, of Maracaibo, Venezuela, on the 28th day of November, 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as desired.

The Secretary read as follows:

[El Fonografa, Maracaibo, Venezuela, November 28, 1912.]

Senator ELIHU ROOT, who before the whole Spanish America protested, when he was Secretary of State, that the United States did not desire even 1 inch more of territory than that which it already possessed and that the sovereignty of our different States would be respected, and who praised us for our ability and aptness for self-government, by one stroke of the pen has blotted out those statements and other still stronger ones which he made in regard to the autonomy and independence of Spanish America. In his last speech he says: "All America down to Panama, including the islands of the Caribbean Sea, must be under our flag. We need Cuba, Mexico, and Central America as a man needs his two arms and a woman her two earrings."

In view of this flagrant contradiction, will there be anyone amongst us who will have a particle of faith in the friendly protests of the United States?

We must not entertain any illusions. It is evident that the United States not only do not intend to endeavor to prevent Europe from taking possession of Latin America, but they themselves pretend to become the arbiters of our political and commercial destinies.

Mr. ROOT. Because of the use which is being made of this publication by the enemies of the United States, by the men who wish to stir up strife and create ill feeling between the Latin-American countries and the United States, I wish to repeat here in the most formal and public manner, and to make a public record of the denials which I have already made as to the authenticity of this pretended speech.

The alleged expressions which are thus imputed to me are impudent forgeries. I never made any such speech. I never said any such things or wrote any such things. The expressions contained in these spurious and pretended extracts are inconsistent with my opinions and abhorrent to my feelings. They are the exact opposite of the views which I have expressed on hundreds of occasions during many years, both publicly and privately, officially and personally, and which I now hold and maintain. I will add, Mr. President, that they are inconsistent with the views and the feelings of the great body of the American people.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA & SANTA FE RAILWAY.

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 7415) granting to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. a right of way through the Fort Wingate Military Reservation in New Mexico, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 1119) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the bill.

Mr. CATRON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 5, after the word "hereby," to strike out "empowered" and insert "granted a revocable license," and on page 2, line 22, after the word "taken," to insert:

Provided further, That any other person or duly organized corporation constructing a railroad along a line necessitating the crossing of said reservation may, upon obtaining a license from the Secretary of War, use the track and other constructions herein authorized to be placed upon the reservation by the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. upon paying just compensation; and, if the parties concerned can not agree upon the amount of such compensation, the sum or sums to be paid for said use shall be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That before this act shall become operative a description by metes and bounds of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be approved by the Secretary of War.

On page 2, line 29, after the word "Kansas," to insert "and other parties obtaining license from the Secretary of War as hereinbefore provided," and to insert new sections, 3 and 4, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., of Kansas, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas, be, and the same is hereby, granted a revocable license to survey, locate, construct, and maintain a railway, telegraph, and telephone line into and upon Fort Wingate Military Reservation, N. Mex., to connect with its present right of way, as may be determined and approved by the Secretary of War or the chief officer of the department under whose supervision such reservation may otherwise fall.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, telegraph, and telephone line, and for no other purpose, a right of way 200 feet in width through said Fort Wingate Reservation, with the right to use other additional ground when cuts and fills may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of said roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of the said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill, excepting, however, from said right of way hereby granted that strip or portion thereof which would be included within the limits of the present 200-foot right of way heretofore granted to said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. and used by it as its main line right of way: Provided, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railway, telegraph, and telephone lines and the use and enjoyment of the rights and privileges herein granted; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the United States, from which the same shall be taken: Provided further, That any other person or duly organized corporation constructing a railroad along a line necessitating the crossing of said reservation may, upon obtaining a license from the Secretary of War, use the track and other constructions herein authorized to be placed upon the reservation by the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. upon paying just compensation; and, if the parties concerned can not agree upon the amount of such compensation, the sum or sums to be paid for said use shall be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That before this act shall become operative a description by metes and bounds of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., of Kansas, and other parties obtaining license from the Secretary of War as hereinbefore provided, shall comply with such other regulations or conditions as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That the powers herein granted are limited to a period of 50 years unless sooner altered, amended, or repealed by Congress.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. a right of way through the Fort Wingate Military Reservation in New Mexico, and for other purposes."

QUAGMIRE LANDS IN NEVADA.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4994) to authorize the inclosure of certain lands in the State of Nevada containing dangerous quagmires, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1111) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no objection to the present consideration of the bill, but I think it will evoke some considerable discussion.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to say that, while I do not object to this particular bill, I feel I ought, in justice to appropriation bills, to object to a bill that will consume any time in debate; and if this bill will probably consume time in debate, I should feel that I had to object.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I supposed, Mr. President, there would be no objection to this bill, which is reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he intends to discuss it?

Mr. WARREN. I have no intention of discussing the bill, but two or three Senators about me have said that it would lead to discussion, and that they wanted to discuss it.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it go over.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he will not permit the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not object to the present consideration of this bill. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that, on the contrary, I am quite willing that it should be considered at this time, but I think it is quite evident that it will evoke some discussion in the Senate before it is finally voted upon. I certainly have some few suggestions that I should like to present upon the bill, and I think there are other Senators who have.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to object. If I am not allowed to say anything further, I simply object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not endeavor to control the Senator in that regard. The Senator from South Dakota objects and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 8141) for the relief of S. W. Niemeyer; to the Committee on Claims.

(By request.) A bill (S. 8142) to acquire certain land between Peabody and Underwood Streets, east of Georgia Avenue, for a public park; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CULLOM:

A bill (S. 8143) for the relief of Edward N. McCarty; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 8144) granting an increase of pension to William L. Sheaff;

A bill (S. 8145) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Cassiday;

A bill (S. 8146) granting an increase of pension to John Emanuel Smith (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 8147) granting an increase of pension to Allen H. De Groff; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 8148) granting an increase of pension to Lottie E. Limont; and

A bill (S. 8149) granting a pension to Catherine Soper (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 8150) providing for an extension of the limits of time provided by sections 1 and 2 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act providing for the validation of certain homestead entries"; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 8151) to provide for the acquiring of additional ground for the site of the public building at Lewiston, Idaho; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 8152) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SANDERS:

A bill (S. 8153) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "The Civil War Volunteer Officers' Retired List," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A bill (S. 8154) for the relief of Peter Magsam, alias Peter Moxom, alias Peter Groh; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 8155) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Jared (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 8156) granting a pension to Omar E. Brown (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 8157) granting an increase of pension to Louis C. Emmett (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 8158) granting an increase of pension to Christian Bowman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 8159) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Collar (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 8160) granting an increase of pension to Baxter Johnson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the purchase of stock, seeds, implements, and such other articles as may be necessary to enable the Indians residing and having tribal rights on the Uintah and Ouray Reservations, Utah, to become established in a self-supporting industry on their allotments of land, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 and $7,483.01, respectively, to credit in the accounts of Pay Directors Lawrence G. Boggs and S. R. Colhoun, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 and interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from October 30, 1843, to pay to the administrator of the estate of John W. West, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury standing to the credit of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JESSE J. LAMKIN.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Jesse J. Lamkin, late of Troop H, First Regiment United States Cavalry, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there being no adverse report on the same.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS (S. DOC. NO. 1010).

Mr. OWEN. I present a paper in the nature of a memorial from the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians with reference to their leased district. I ask that the memorial, with illustrations, be printed as a Senate document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs to accompany the bill (S. 8140) to authorize the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians to bring suit in the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, introduced by me on yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. OWEN. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 433) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is directed to report on Senate bill 8118 by February 3.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the bill referred to, Senate bill 8118, is a bill providing——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OWEN. I ask for its present consideration and I wish briefly to explain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma asks for the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. LODGE. The chairman of the committee is absent. I think the resolution had better go over until he is here as it proposes instructions to his committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, on an objection, the resolution will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. OWEN. I shall not be able to be present again for some days, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed, by the consent of the Senate, to make such remarks as he may wish.

Mr. OWEN. The bill provides for making effective the law relating to the publicity of campaign contributions. There is no adequate method now by which it can be required. The bill provides that the circuit or district court, upon a proper showing, may require the publicity fixed by law to be made. It also provides means for an inquiry into the question of the campaign contributions. I think it is a bill which ought to be reported on, so as to make complete the law which we have passed. The committee will have three meetings between now and the date which I suggest should be fixed for the report. I hope that the matter may be acted on, whether I shall be present or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over on objection.

COL. RICHARD H. WILSON.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 7515) for the relief of Col. Richard H. Wilson, Fourteenth Infantry United States Army.

Mr. SMOOT. That bill will lead to some discussion I think, will it not?

Mr. MYERS. I do not think so. It is a bill that I tried to get up the other day, and a couple of Senators who objected at that time have withdrawn their objection. I do not think there will be any discussion or objection to it. I may take two or three minutes to explain it, but I do not think it will lead to any discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read first. I really do not remember the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Military Affairs report as an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That Col. Richard H. Wilson, Fourteenth Infantry United States Army, be, and he is hereby, exonerated from all responsibility for the loss of the sum of $7,181.64 at Fort William Henry Harrison, Mont., on or about May 16 to 20, 1912. And the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Capt. Charles W. Castle, paymaster, the sum of $7,181.64.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as I said a few moments ago, I shall feel constrained to object if the bill is to lead to an extensive debate. The bill is a most just one. The subject I know all about, and I should be glad to see it passed. So I shall not object if the bill does not lead to an extensive debate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I am unable to find the report on this bill. It seems to me that we ought not to be asked to vote upon a measure under a unanimous consent where we can find out nothing to guide us in the report of the committee. The report of the committee certainly ought to be on file before we are asked to vote on these measures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the report is on the desk.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is not on our desks here.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to say to the Senator from South Dakota that I called up this bill about a week ago, and objection was made because the report had not been printed. It was printed a week ago and is on the desks of all Senators.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the full report submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs shows all the facts in the case. The bill was unanimously approved by the Military Committee, and is a most meritorious one, and it ought to pass unanimously.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to say to the Senator from South Dakota that Col. Wilson's pay is now being held up at the War Department on account of money sent to pay the troops being stolen from the paymaster. He was technically in charge. I never saw him. It happened at Fort Harrison. I think it is probably as crucial a little bill as has been reported here. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I withdraw my objection. I had not been able to find the report.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, being House bill 26680.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the Senate adjourned. The Chair is informed that the question is upon the amendment proposed in the Senate, which was pending at the time of adjournment, and upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the pending question is upon the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. And it was submitted by the Chair to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was made by myself and submitted by the Chair to a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question was on the point of order?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. And upon the vote the yeas and nays were called, and a want of a quorum was developed. I wish the Senator from Iowa could see his way clear to recall his point of order. In my own opinion a point of order hardly lies against the matter in any way, because the employees of the House and Senate are at the will of those Houses and there is no regular estimate expected and none had. Such matters are usually settled between the House and the Senate. This only requires it to go to conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. If there were any way in which the submission to the Senate could be avoided I would be very glad to have the Chair rule upon the point of order, so that it could be speedily disposed of.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Iowa can withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. I said if there were any way in which the submission to the Senate could be avoided I would be very glad if the Chair in the regular way would decide the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. The point of order has been submitted to the Senate and a roll call has been had upon it. I do not see how the Chair can now rule upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not see that the Chair can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said I would be perfectly willing to take that course in order to avoid the consumption of time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, unless there is a request for unanimous consent on that line, will direct the roll to be called.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not sure, an ineffective roll call having been had, whether it is possible to make any further statement in regard to it, because we must call the roll on that question. Whether it is still open to debate, one roll call having been had, I confess for the moment I do not know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senate having adjourned for the lack of a quorum, the matter is before the Senate de novo.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. The roll call, of course, has been ordered. That can not be undone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. LODGE. Then, I should like to say one word about it, if it is open.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. A point of order was made on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I am not going to discuss the merits of the amendment. I am very clear as to what the Senate ought to do, and I said so last night. I am going to confine myself simply to the point of order. The point of order, if these are expenses estimated for, of course, is a good one. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations suggests that these payments of employees are not estimated for in the ordinary way and that a point of order would not lie.

What I desired to call attention to was this: There seemed to be a misapprehension in regard to the question of submission. The Chair, under our rules, is required to submit a point of order to the effect that an amendment is not germane. He has permission to submit any other question of order. It has been the practice of the occupants of the chair to comparatively rarely submit questions of order, and I think it ought to be done very seldom, indeed; but the purpose of that power of submission is to relieve the Chair from the necessity of breaking a rule in a case where an emergency exists, so that the Senate, if it chooses, may suspend the rule for that particular item. It has been done here repeatedly—not often, but repeatedly. The famous Platt amendment, on which all our relations with Cuba depend, had to be passed at a certain time. It unquestionably was out of order; it was put on an appropriation bill, but it had to go on an appropriation bill in order to become a law. The point of order would certainly have thrown it out; it was general legislation beyond any question, but I do not remember whether the point of order was raised. I merely mean that if it had been raised it would have been a case for this action, which I have seen taken more than once in the Senate, to give the Senate an opportunity in a particular case to suspend the operation of one of its rules against amendments.

Mr. President, though that is, I am aware, a very large discretion and one to be very sparingly exercised, it is absolutely necessary that somewhere in the procedure of the two Houses there should be some point where there should be a little discretion, a little elasticity, in a case that might arise of the necessity of an amendment to an appropriation bill.

My own impression, I will say frankly, last night was that the amendment was clearly out of order. If I had been in the chair, I would have so ruled. The point which the Senator from Wyoming has just made had not occurred to me. If I had been compelled to rule, I should have so ruled; but the Chair, under the authority given him by the rules for that particular purpose, submitted that question to the Senate, and I voted in the affirmative—that is, I voted that it should be submitted—not that I thought it was in order, but because I felt very decidedly that it was an instance in which that rule ought to be suspended by the action of the Senate in order to admit the amendment—a very trifling amendment in itself, but one which in its nature involves the relations between the two Houses. That the relations between the two Houses should be good always is essential to the orderly conduct of Government business. Last night in the debate there was an illustration of the importance of it. We all know that it is the practice of the Senate not to refer to what has occurred in the other House. That is inherited from the English practice. We do not discuss what is said in the other House; so far as possible we avoid reference to their actions; we never refer to a Member of the other House by name or personally. That is a rule that is always strictly observed and it is absolutely necessary; yet last night, in the discussion which arose, we began to discuss here the authority of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House, and of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, to make the request here. I only mention that to show to what sort of thing this would lead. We must not discuss their arrangements or the conduct of their own affairs in their own House, and they must not discuss ours, because, if we should do so, in a very short time there would grow up a fashion of recrimination between the two Houses which would lead to ill feeling, to the arrest of legislation, and to the greatest possible trouble.

That is the reason why I thought this trifling amendment, raising the pay of a House employee $500, or whatever it was, involved a matter of great importance, of such great importance that it seemed to me necessary to submit it to the Senate, and I thought the presiding officer was correct in submitting it to the Senate in view of its importance, and of such great importance that I thought it my duty to vote to sustain the rule. I did not undertake to vote that the amendment was in order, for I thought at the time it was distinctly out of order, and, as I have stated, I should have so ruled had I been in the chair; but I did think it was an occasion which justified the suspension of the rule in that manner, as I have seen it done more than once, as I have already said.

Mr. President, just a word in conclusion. I have said that much in explanation of my attitude and why I voted as I did, as I have known other Senators to vote in the past; but the point which the Senator from Wyoming has made did not occur to me—that this amendment referring to the salary of an employee to one of the Houses is not obnoxious to the rule and is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire if those expenditures are not contained in the Book of Estimates the same as expenditures in the departments?

Mr. LODGE. They are transmitted, but the lists are made up here in the offices of the Senate and in those of the House; not a figure is changed, not a suggestion is offered, and no estimate——

Mr. BRISTOW. But they are contained in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, they are contained in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. BRISTOW. The same as all other department expenditures.

Mr. LODGE. As a memorandum only.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just as this Book of Estimates is made for the various departments and the various bureaus and for Congress.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is not.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, the information comes from the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, the same as from the Cabinet officers for the various departments.

Mr. LODGE. The estimates proper come from the Cabinet officers. These estimates do not come from them. They really are not estimates, but are simply transmitted here to show what stands on the books as the current law.

Mr. BRISTOW. The estimates of the expenditures that come under the jurisdiction of a Cabinet officer are made by the Cabinet officer; the estimates that come under the Senate are made by the officers of the Senate and furnished to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. They have no authority to estimate for us; not the slightest.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, but the Secretary of the Treasury is required to estimate for the expenses of the Government, and he does it under the law.

Mr. LODGE. Why, Mr. President, the Senator forgets our rule, "or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments." There is no estimate from the head of a department about our expenditures. Would any Senator suggest for a moment that the Secretary of the Treasury or any other head of a department is to estimate what the contingent fund of the Senate or of the House should be or what they shall pay their clerks? Of course, Mr. President, these estimates are simply submitted for information. The mere inclusion of the figures in the Book of Estimates does not make an estimate. The rule says "an estimate of the head of some one of the departments." No head of a department estimates for the expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not care whether the salary of the clerk of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives is $2,500 or $3,000. If he earns $3,000, he ought to have it; but I do not want anybody to assume that I make the point of order because I have any disposition to interfere with the House in fixing the salaries of its own employees. It is to preserve that very rule that I have made the point of order. The House has fixed in this bill the salaries of its employees, and we have not interfered with their work, nor do we propose to do so.

The thing which it seems to me is wrong, and which may lead to great trouble in the future, is that certain suggestions made by certain Members of the House are offered here and submitted, and we are asked to accept their suggestions as the equivalent of an act of the House. It is not difficult to see that if we recognize that procedure we may in the end entirely lose the benefit of the rule of courtesy and comity to which reference has been made.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] spoke so emphatically, and so wisely, too, upon the rule which forbids a reference here to the individual Members of the House that it seems to me he condemned in the strongest possible way the introduction of a communication to the Senate from either the chairman of the Judiciary Committee or the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House. We must take the work of the House as it comes to us through the regular channels. I think that rule ought to be inviolably preserved.

Now, I want the Senate to know that I have no objection, of course, to the submission of the point of order to the Senate. The Presiding Officer was quite within his rights, and I think probably quite within a fair exercise of the discretion that officer has, in submitting to the Senate the interpretation of the rule. I am not complaining about that; but when the Senator from Massachusetts says that because these amounts are not estimated for by the head of a department therefore they are not within the rule which I invoke, I think he is obviously mistaken. The rule provides that—> no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless—

And then the rule proceeds to point out certain exceptions. If this increase is not within one of those exceptions, it is forbidden by the rule, and no one claims that it is within any of the exceptions.

I am inclined to differ from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] with regard to the words "head of a department." I am inclined to think that does not apply to estimates submitted by the officers of the House of Representatives or of the Senate; but that makes no difference whatsoever. Unless you find some exception here which will take the case out of the general rule announced in the words which I have read, then it is plainly forbidden by the rule.

It seems to me, of course, that this is not a very material matter. We have many other appropriation bills, and if the House wants to put this provision in any other appropriation bill it can do so, and if it wants to pass an independent measure of that kind it can do so. I think the great importance of the matter lies in preserving the integrity of the rules of the Senate, for if we fall into the habit of disregarding them then we become rather chaotic in our procedure, it seems to me.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, having occupied the chair on yesterday when this amendment was offered, I choose now to submit an observation or two in reference to the situation and proceeding attending its consideration. As the RECORD discloses, after some explanatory discussion of the amendment the point was made by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the amendment was not in order under the rules on the pending appropriation bill. It is only frankness to state that on the question being raised the then occupant of the chair had no doubt whatever as to the status of the amendment under either clause 1 or clause 3 of Rule XVI. But in the preliminary discussion it had developed that a somewhat delicate question of amity, or comity, or courtesy, or whatever you may see fit to call it, as between the two Houses was involved. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case the then occupant of the chair felt constrained in deference to the Senate to exercise the discretion lodged in the Chair under the rules and submit the question of order to the judgment of the Senate. The question could have been so framed as to simply submit the interrogatory whether the question on the amendment should be put to the Senate, but this would have been a palpable evasion of the question of order under the rule.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may say one word more, this amendment, if not in order, could be so held only under two provisions. It is not general legislation. It is not a private claim. It must be out of order, because it is not "moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments." Last night, if I had been in the chair and had been called upon to rule, I should have ruled that it was not estimated for.

Mr. CUMMINS. Rule XVI, paragraph 1, provides:

> And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add a new item of appropriation—

How does the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. It also says "unless"——

Mr. CUMMINS. How does the Senator from Massachusetts escape that prohibition?

Mr. LODGE. It may come under the "unless" clause.

Mr. CUMMINS. Read the exception.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, it is not to carry out any provision of existing law or treaty stipulation——

Mr. CUMMINS. That does not cover it.

Mr. LODGE. That does not cover it. I was about to say I should have ruled it out on the ground that it was not estimated for, and, therefore, did not fulfill that condition; but I think after the suggestion made by the Senator from Wyoming that that does not apply.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. I am discussing the various suggestions. Last night I certainly should not have ruled it out, if I had to rule on it, on the ground that it was not proposed by a committee, because I should have held that an amendment accepted by the committee became a committee amendment and the work of the committee. It never would have occurred to me to rule it defective on that ground.

Mr. WARREN. It was offered by a member of the committee as a committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. That is what takes it out of the rule.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not understand that it was offered as a committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. It was offered by a member of the committee and was accepted by the chairman, as I supposed, acting for the committee, and no member of the committee objected. That, I considered, made it a committee amendment. But the trouble I had last night was that I thought it was not estimated for.

Mr. CUMMINS. I does not need to be estimated for.

Mr. LODGE. The chairman has now made it clear that appropriations for the payment of our own employees or those of the House do not require to be estimated for; that we can fix them ourselves. I ought to have thought of that, but I did not. It is undoubtedly true.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to be misunderstood. I supposed, as a general proposition, that no Member of the Senate could offer an amendment increasing an appropriation contained in the bill, or to add a new item, unless it is to carry out existing law, or unless it has been approved by a standing committee.

Mr. LODGE. I think this fulfills that provision——

Mr. CUMMINS. Or unless it has been estimated for.

Mr. LODGE. It does not need to be estimated for, and the amendment has been proposed by a standing committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it does not have to be estimated for if it is moved by a standing committee, or if it is to carry out existing law; but this amendment is neither to carry out existing law nor moved by a standing committee——

Mr. LODGE. That is where I differ with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nor estimated for. Now, if it is put this morning in the form of being offered or moved by the Appropriations Committee, then, of course, my point of order disappears at once.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I voted yesterday afternoon in accordance with my opinion that the proposed increase was out of order. I did not understand that the Committee on Appropriations was the father of this amendment or presented it. Of course, as the Senator from Iowa says, if the Committee on Appropriations takes the responsibility for it now, it is not subject to the point of order and it is clearly within the power of the Senate to act upon it.

Mr. LODGE. As I said, I supposed last night that it was offered by a member of the committee and that it was offered as a committee amendment. I have been informed that since then the committee has been formally polled and that a majority of the committee favor the amendment. It will let us out of the trouble we are in if the Senator from Iowa will withdraw his point of order and allow the amendment to be reoffered in the name of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. With the understanding that it is to take that form, and that the amendment is to be withdrawn as an individual amendment, I withdraw the point of order. I do not care to insist upon a vote on an immaterial question.

Mr. LODGE. Then if the Senator from Virginia will withdraw it as an individual amendment, all the subsequent proceedings fall, and he can reoffer it as a committee amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it is true I am a member of the committee, but I offered the amendment as an individual Senator. But I withdraw it, and it will now be presented as a committee amendment, the committee having in the meantime taken action in regard to it. If the chairman of the committee will indicate that he will make that motion, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary, first, in order that the parliamentary situation may be directly kept in view, that the Senate get rid of the order already passed for taking the vote by yeas and nays. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that even last night I would have asked to put the matter in the way now proposed except for the parliamentary situation. The true situation is this: The amendment was practically offered by the committee; it was considered by the committee in the method we have always followed and agreed to, provided we should later receive the written request of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. We received later the request in writing of the chairman of the committee on the other side of the Capitol that the committee report it. That came in at a later hour and was handed to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who offered the amendment, not observing, probably, that one of the letters was addressed to the committee and the other to the chairman. It would have been perfectly competent for me to have offered it as a committee amendment because it was, in fact, such.

As to the parliamentary situation, I leave that to the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to be put in a false position. The Senator from Wyoming is in error. If he will turn to the RECORD of the Senate he will see that the amendment was not offered on behalf of the committee, neither by the chairman nor by any other member of it. It was offered by the Senator from Virginia in his individual right.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, well, Mr. President, you might as well say that I offer in my individual right any amendment agreed upon by the committee. The Senator from Virginia is a member of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then may I ask the Senator from Wyoming what does the rule mean when it says "moved by a standing committee"? Who acts for the committee?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator can make his own construction of that; but amendments are offered by various members of the committee; sometimes by the chairman and sometimes by other members of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I take it the Senator from Wyoming believes that whenever a Senator who happens to be a member of a committee offers an amendment relating to a bill of which the committee has been in charge, it is understood as being a committee amendment?

Mr. WARREN. If it is authorized by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. There was no suggestion in the RECORD of yesterday that that was the case.

Mr. WARREN. It is supposed to be taken as a matter of course. I may have been at fault in not elaborating that, but I supposed that that was taken as a matter of course.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion, the Senator who offered the amendment has just stated that he did not offer it as a committee amendment, but offered it as an individual amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want the RECORD to be perfectly clear on that point. Otherwise I would not have made the point of order. The RECORD states:

> Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. On page 16, in line 15, I move to amend by striking out "$2,500" and inserting "$3,000" after the word "clerk."

And so on. Never a suggestion that it had received the concurrence of the committee or was authorized by the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to say that when those two letters were sent to the desk I had not read them. I did not know they were addressed to the chairman of the committee. They were handed to me on the floor of the Senate when the bill was almost in the act of being passed. I had not taken time even to read them. The Member of the House who handed them to me told me what they contained as he handed them to me. If I had known the letters were addressed to the chairman of the committtee, I should have handed them to him and he would have made the motion instead of myself.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. One minute, please. But when I made the motion I made it, I say, under those circumstances and as an individual Senator, and did not offer it as a committee amendment. I did not even know what was in those letters. But the chairman of the committee at once accepted the amendment, and I supposed that that made it a committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Now will the Senator from Virginia allow me?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator will remember that he brought the subject up to me and other members of the committee, and we stated then that if those letters appeared, we would offer it as a committee amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Beyond doubt that is the fact. At a full meeting the committee authorized this to be reported to the Senate as a committee amendment when these conditions were met. I did not know when I offered the amendment whether these conditions would be met, and I had not read the letters; but the letters being read, disclosed the fact that the conditions the committee had prescribed in order to have this offered as a committee amendment had been complied with. That is the condition of the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it seems to me we can easily get out of this trouble, which I think is unfortunate in every aspect. I am going to ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated. Then I suggest that a majority of the Committee on Appropriations have in writing now given their assent to this amendment, and it will then be offered by the Senator from Wyoming as a committee amendment. I first ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the order directing the vote to be taken by yeas and nays be vacated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is vacated by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. There are two or three other committee amendments, which I send up.

Mr. LODGE. Let us dispose of this first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Iowa practically withdraws his point of order. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 15, strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000"; in the same line strike out "$1,600" and insert "$2,000"; and in the same line strike out

"$720" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000," so that if amended it will read:

Judiciary—Clerk $3,000, assistant clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Understanding, Mr. President, that this amendment is now offered by the authority of the committee and is therefore moved by a standing committee, I do not make any point of order against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I have a supplemental request or estimate from the Auditor of the Post Office Department which, as it leads to economy, I offer. It is to reduce or change 14 clerks to 7 clerks and 7 skilled laborers.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, line 13, strike out "14 at $1,000 each," and insert in lieu thereof "7 at $1,000 each; 7 skilled laborers at $900," and in line 14 change the total to read "$49,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee the reason why on line 23, page 12, we find inserted the name "George H. Carter" as clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing. Other clerks of committees are, without exception, appropriated for by the office, and not by name.

Mr. President, I am not questioning the competency of this clerk or intimating that he ought not to be continued in the position he holds; but I do not understand why a clerk who has hitherto been appropriated for by his office as clerk to the Joint Committee on Printing should now be appropriated for by name. If that policy is to be adopted, I do not know why a particular clerk should be singled out and designated by name, when scores of clerks of committees are appropriated for by the office which they hold, and not by name. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee if there is any good reason why this exception should be made.

Mr. WARREN. It is not an innovation; it is nothing new. We have for many years carried one or more names, sometimes in the House and sometimes in the Senate, and now both. One of the gentlemen at the desk of the Senate has his name included in every bill. The superintendent of the document room has been appropriated for by name almost ever since I have been a member of the Senate. There is a man accredited to the Committee on Commerce whose name is inserted in the bill. It is not the plan followed, except in exceptional cases.

It was represented to the committee, and the committee's investigation bore out the representation, that this man had very great talent to fill this place, and it was the expressed wish of the members of the committee on both sides politically, and from both the House and the Senate, that this should be done; and in order to get at it it was brought up in that way.

I agree with the Senator that a general practice of putting the names of clerks in the appropriation bill would be improper, but there are cases where we have old and valued employees. For instance, the committee of which he is an honored member and of which I am chairman had inserted in the bill not the name but the words "the present incumbent," which every one knew to refer to the clerk—Mr. Cleaves. On the House side the same thing is true in the case of the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations. The clerk of that committee has been there longer than I have been a Member of this body. Every year, while his name is not mentioned, the extra appropriation is made for him as "the present incumbent." So whether the practice is good or bad it is not a new one, and, of course, it must require, I will not say unanimous consent, but large support. However, it is not new, and it was not put in in any surreptitious manner. It came in in the regular manner.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, Mr. President, I have not intimated that it got in in any surreptitious manner. Of course it did not get in in any surreptitious manner. It is printed here, and everybody knows it.

We all know that for several years, perhaps, an assistant secretary of the Senate has been mentioned by name in the appropriation act, and his very able and faithful and useful services here are such that I would not appear to be wounding him by making any suggestion as to a continuation in his case of what has heretofore been done. It having been done in his case, and he being an exceptionally admirable officer, I would not even make a suggestion by moving to amend it. I would not do that because it might be construed as unfriendly, perhaps, as his name has been inserted heretofore so often.

The same is true as to Mr. Boyd in the document room. I have not made any suggestion as to that, and for the same reason, although it is bad practice, and it ought not to be done. As a legislative procedure it can not be justified. Employees of the Senate ought not to be appropriated for by name, but by the offices which they hold, and so long as they hold those offices they would draw the pay assigned to the office by the action of the Senate. But I do say that this practice ought not to be extended. As to those two cases, I have not made any motion, and do not intend to make any motion, although I consider the practice a bad one. In the case of the other gentlemen I have referred to who have been included by name heretofore I shall not ask that any change be made, but I wanted to know whether there was any good reason why this bad rule should be extended.

If there is any reason why it should be extended in this case, why not extend it and name all the clerks and appropriate for all the committee clerks by name? I do not believe myself there is any justification for this extension of this bad rule, and as no reason has been assigned why it should be done, I move that the name be stricken out and that the bill be amended——

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator withhold his motion until I can make a statement?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will.

Mr. SMOOT. This question came up yesterday and was discussed somewhat, as the Senator will see if he has read the RECORD this morning.

Mr. George H. Carter is so eminently qualified for the position that there is not a member on the committee on the part of the Senate who has not requested that he be designated by name in the appropriation bill for the place. George H. Carter has given years of attention to the work, and the Senator himself knows that there is no committee of the Senate that has the daily detail drudgery to perform that the Joint Committee on Printing is called upon to do. Mr. Carter is familiar with every phase of the work. He knows the printing law and all the rules of the committee. He is eminently qualified for the position. It was for that reason his name was put in the bill.

It is not a question, Mr. President, of politics. Mr. George H. Carter is a gentleman from Iowa. I suppose many, many Senators know him. As I said yesterday, I do not believe there is a man in the United States so well qualified for the place as Mr. Carter. Think of the hundreds and thousands and even millions of documents printed by the Government. Yet Mr. Carter knows just where they are stored, how many there are, and how they should be distributed. It seems to me there should be no objection to his name being mentioned in the bill as clerk of the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if Mr. Carter is so eminently qualified and so thoroughly satisfactory to every one, why ask to tie the hands of those who are to come after him? I am not intimating that he ought not to be continued as clerk of that committee. From what has been stated, it seems to me there is no doubt about the fact that he will be continued as the clerk of the committee. But why single him out? There are other committee clerks here who are just as efficient and just as faithful and just as satisfactory. Why not let the committee determine that? If this high qualification exists, and I do not doubt it, why not trust the committee to use a wise discretion and continue him as clerk of the committee, if they think it is proper to do so? Why forestall their action and interfere with their freedom of choice in the selection of a clerk of that committee?

There can be, Mr. President, no good reason for that. I never imagined that it was politics. I did not think it was politics, but I did think that there was a desire—and not an objectionable desire—to be a little personal in this matter, and I do not know but that it was shared in just as much by Democrats as Republicans. Indeed I am sure of it, for at least one member of that committee has spoken to me on this subject very much on the line of the Senator from Utah. But I do not think we should be showing partiality and personal favors in the general legislation of Congress. I do not think this name ought to be inserted in the bill, unless you are going to adopt a new rule and appropriate for committee clerks by name. I look upon it as bad legislation. It has been done in a few instances in the past, and I am simply protesting against the extension of that system. In this particular instance no good reason has been assigned why it should be done.

I hope the Senate will, in that item of the appropriation bill, in lines 23 and 24, strike out the name George H. Carter.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What substantial advantage would Mr. Carter obtain by having his name included in the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It will secure him the place for the next year. Every member of the committee on the part of the Senate desires that he should be continued as clerk of the committee.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I infer from the statement of the Senator from Utah that it will give a certain degree of permanency to his tenure in this particular place.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the object of it. I wish to say that there is no partiality shown to him as a man.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not objecting, I will say.

Mr. SMOOT. There are dozens of clerks around the Senate for whom I have just as high regard as I have for Mr. Carter, but I do know——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator need not defend Mr. Carter against any implied accusation in any remarks I made. I simply wanted to know what he was doing and what the effect would be. The explanation made about Mr. Carter's competency is sufficient. The place requiring long training and experience, the explanation satisfies me, and I want to leave it there, but I want to know what I am doing when I leave it there. You legislate him into the bill until the appropriation expires in July, 1914?

Mr. SMOOT. It is continuing him only one year.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. One year from June 30. Having known what I am to do and what my vote amounts to, I am prepared to cast it to leave his name in the bill.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to inquire what has become of the unfinished business.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that this question has been disposed of. There is a motion pending.

Mr. WORKS. I do not want any vote to be taken to displace the unfinished business. The hour has arrived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. Unless some Senator desires to address the Senate upon the unfinished business, I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia. The question in the mind of the Chair is whether the motion should not be to reconsider the action whereby the amendmnet was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been adopted?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It should be reconsidered, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment was agreed to by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and then in the Senate the action was to concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, and now the bill stands with that amendment concurred in. It seems to the Chair that the motion must be to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My understanding is that the bill came from the committee to the Senate with that amendment in it, and it is in order to act on the amendment when we get into the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the recollection of the Chair, and the RECORD will show, that the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There has been nothing of that sort done, as I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be found on page 1565 of the RECORD.

Mr. WARREN. The RECORD shows that the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They have not been approved in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Here is the language, on page 1565:

> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.
> The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move, then, to reconsider the vote. I was not aware of the fact that the amendment had been concurred in in the Senate. I move, therefore, that the action of the Senate so far as this item is concerned be reconsidered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask that the Senator enlarge his motion so as to cover each one of the amendments inserting the name of an individual. There are several of them.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator surely does not mean to take those in the current law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but each of the amendments reported by the committee adding a new name.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the better practice is to act on each one as they come in different parts of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. One at a time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. One at a time. This is an innovation. It is an extension of the practice which I think is a bad legislative practice. This name has not been in any other appropriation bill, and I prefer, therefore, that it should be singled out and disposed of individually and separately. Then any other name will be open to the same objection, if a Senator desires to offer the amendment. The present motion, therefore, is to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on lines 23 and 24 on page 12 was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Virginia, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment indicated by him was concurred in. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A division!

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. We always gain time by calling for the yeas and nays when a division is demanded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right—the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). The junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is unavoidably absent from the city to-day.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who is detained from the Senate on account of sickness. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. FOSTER (when Mr. THORNTON's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. THORNTON] is unavoidably absent from the Senate.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PAYNTER. I desire to inquire if the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. PAYNTER. I have a general pair with that Senator and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LIPPITT (after having voted in the negative). In voting, I neglected to state that I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], which I transfer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

Mr. DU PONT (after having voted in the negative). When I voted I supposed that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was in the Chamber. As I have a general pair with that Senator, and he is not present, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

Mr. MCCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I understand that my pair is not present in the Chamber, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Bankhead	Heiskell	Martin, Va.	Shively
Borah	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Johnston, Ala.	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Burton	Johnston, Tex.	Owen	Swanson
Clapp	Jones	Perky	Tillman
Crawford	Kern	Poindexter	Townsend
Gore	La Follette	Pomerene	Works

NAYS—28.

Bourne	Cummins	Kenyon	Root
Brandegee	Dillingham	Lippitt	Sanders
Brown	Fletcher	Lodge	Smoot
Burnham	Foster	Nelson	Stephenson
Catron	Gallinger	Oliver	Sutherland
Clarke, Ark.	Gronna	Page	Warren
Cullom	Jackson	Perkins	Wetmore

NOT VOTING—34.

Ashurst	Curtis	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Dixon	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	du Pont	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Briggs	Fall	Overman	Stone
Chamberlain	Gamble	Paynter	Thornton
Chilton	Gardner	Penrose	Watson
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Percy	Williams
Crane	Lea	Reed
Culberson	McCumber	Richardson

So the motion of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I now move that the bill be amended by striking out the name "George H. Carter," in lines 23 and 24, on page 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes it that the motion having been reconsidered whereby the amendment was concurred in, the question now comes on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. A negative vote, of course, would be in favor of the proposition which the Senator from Virginia makes to strike out.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understand, then, the Chair will put the question whether or not the amendment shall be concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Those who want to have the name taken out will vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will vote "nay." The question is on concurring in the amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, inserting the name "George H. Carter." [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is not present in the Chamber, and I will withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote to sustain the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I will again announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and its transfer to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], as on the previous vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], which I transfer to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], and I vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and its transfer to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY]. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent from the Senate on account of illness. While I am on my feet I will inquire whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted. I do not see him in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON. I desire, first, to announce the necessary absence from the Senate Chamber of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I wish to announce, further, that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON], that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bourne	Cummins	Kenyon	Root
Bradley	Dillingham	Lippitt	Sanders
Brandegee	du Pont	Lodge	Smoot
Brown	Fletcher	McLean	Stephenson
Burnham	Foster	Nelson	Sutherland
Burton	Gallinger	Oliver	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Gronna	Page	Wetmore

Crane	Lea	Richardson

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 7. That hereafter in the event of reductions being made in any force employed under the civil service or in any of the executive departments or independent establishments no honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine who has had active service in the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, or the Philippine insurrection, whose record is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank, class, salary, or compensation. Any person knowingly violating the provisions of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered modifies section 5, which went out on a point of order yesterday, made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I have modified it now by limiting it to those soldiers, sailors, and marines who have had active service either in the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, or the Philippine insurrection. I hope in that form that we may be permitted to vote upon it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I assume that perhaps the Senator from Utah can assure me that the amendment is in the exact terms of the legislation of last year, which took care of those in Washington, and merely extends the same privilege to those outside the District that the original provision did to those inside.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not quite in the same terms. I have made it a little more definite. For example, I have put in after the first word, "That," the word "hereafter." It read in the original law, "That in the event of reductions." I simply put in the word "hereafter," so as to make it the permanent law. Then I have added, after the word "departments," the words "or independent establishments," because there are some establishments that are not under the executive departments. The original law did not include the word "hereafter." For the same reason, to make it entirely clear and definite, I have added after the word "rank" the word "class," and after the word "salary" the words "or compensation," so as to embrace the whole subject matter. With those changes, which simply add to the certainty and clearness of the law, I have simply put in the limitation to which I have already called attention, namely, that it shall only apply to soldiers, sailors, and marines who have seen active service in the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, or the Philippine insurrection.

Mr. JONES. I do not know at what point in the amendment the words should come in, but after the word "executive" I move to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah by inserting the words "or legislative."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Washington as a part of his amendment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the proposed amendment as modified that it is legislation on an appropriaton bill and that it changes existing law. I commented on the matter yesterday, that it is not good policy to use appropriation bills for general legislation. Many Senators who are absent are absent relying upon the integrity of the rules of the Senate, not expecting that there will be put upon appropriation bills legislative items which they have not seen and which they would not perhaps agree to if they did see. I therefore make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it seems to me that the point of order made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which is based upon the rule against general legislation being attached to appropriation bills, is not exactly applicable to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] for the reason that the amendment simply proposes to establish conditions under which the appropriations shall be expended. The amendment relates to employees for whose salaries the appropriations are made and provides for conditions under which the salaries appropriated in the bill shall be apportioned to the various employees. It seems to me for that reason that the amendment is an exception to the general rule, and that the objection to it is not pertinent.

Mr. OWEN. In addition to the suggestions which I have heretofore made against the amendment, I suggest that it would be a criminal statute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It seems to the Chair that the amendment proposes general legislation. The Chair therefore holds that the point of order made by the Senator from Oklahoma is well taken, and it is sustained by the Chair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

That the salaries of the members of the police force employed in the Capitol and in the Senate and House Office Buildings be made equal to the salaries paid to the elevator conductors employed in the said buildings, to wit, $1,200 per annum.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think I shall make the point of order against that amendment for the same reason that I indicated yesterday. If it is a fact that there are gross and palpable inequalities in the pay that is being given to the different employees of the Senate, there ought to be some comprehensive and thorough examination into that matter and the inequalities developed. I am inclined to believe that some salaries will be found to be above the natural average, but by taking off from the employees who are overpaid and giving to those who are underpaid we may bring about an equilibrium that will come nearer doing justice than legislating in this blind way. I raise the point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OWEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

For legislative reference bureau under the direction of the Librarian of Congress, $10,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is not estimated for and it has not been brought before the committee for consideration.

Mr. OWEN. Before the Senator from Wyoming makes the point of order on the amendment I should like to be heard.

Mr. WARREN. I will withhold the point until the Senator from Oklahoma can speak on the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to have an opportunity to explain the purpose of this proposed provision. We have a very great volume of information in our Library and in the records of this Government, which is not conveniently digested altogether for the use of Members of the Senate and of the other House. The legislative reference bureau which has been established in Wisconsin has proved to be of very great value to that State in promoting the character of legislation, in enabling the members of the senate and of the house to perform their duties efficiently, with knowledge of the law relating to any given subject and the decisions of the courts in relation to any given statute. It has been so useful that I think it is obvious that the Congress of the United States ought to have a department of the same character. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is so familiar with this matter, to explain to the Senate in a few words the legislative reference bureau of Wisconsin. As I say, he is very familiar with it and its service. The matter has been reported on by the Librarian of Congress, who appreciates its importance. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin to explain to the Senate what the system is in Wisconsin and its value there.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, my attention was diverted when the Senator began to speak. I presume he is making his remarks upon an amendment which he has offered.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I do not care to take the time of the Senate simply to spread some remarks upon the RECORD here. I presume that a point of order will be made against the amendment and that it will be ruled out as obnoxious to the rule. That being so, I will not at this time submit any observations on the subject. I will say, however, that I purpose to introduce a bill to establish a legislative reference department, which I deem to be of very great importance to Congress and to the country, and endeavor to secure a report upon it in time to offer it as an amendment to another appropriation bill at this session. Since conferring with my friend, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], yesterday regarding the matter, I have made a partial canvass of the members of the Library Committee, and I believe we will be able to have a bill more complete and comprehensive than any amendment which could now be offered reported from that committee before another appropriation bill to which it would be germane as an amendment passes the Senate. Then I hope, Mr. President, to take the time of the Senate very briefly to set forth what has been done in Wisconsin by the establishment of the legislative reference department. I might say its work is broader than that; that does not properly describe it; it is a department of research and investigation and has been very helpful to legislators in Wisconsin in acquiring that exact and comprehensive knowledge of the subjects treated, to insure a body of economically sound progressive statutes.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish simply to say a word. I have nothing to urge against the merits of the amendment, and I am very glad the Senator from Wisconsin was given an opportunity to say that the proposition will be thoroughly perfected before it shall come before the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to be offered in the Senate? If not, the amendments will be ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

GERMAN ORPHAN ASYLUM ASSOCIATION.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that the Senate resume consideration of House bill 19115, commonly known as the omnibus claims bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he will kindly yield to me to request consideration of a bill which, if objected to or debated at all, I will immediately withdraw. It is a District of Columbia bill, which is important to a charitable organization.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the matter will not provoke any discussion, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be immediately withdrawn if it does.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to insist upon pushing the claims bill, because it has been before the Senate a long while and no vote has been had upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7508) to amend an act entitled "An act to reincorporate and preserve all the corporate franchises and property rights of the de facto corporation known as the German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the act entitled "An act to reincorporate and preserve all the corporate franchises and property rights of the de facto corporation known as the German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia," approved February 6, 1901, by adding to and making a part of section 1 of that act the following:

And the said German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia may hereafter fix, limit, and determine the number of directors to constitute its board of directors by any constitution or constitutions which may hereafter be adopted by the said association, and the number of its said directors may be decreased or increased as provided by any constitution or constitutions, or any amendment or amendments thereto, which the said association may lawfully adopt.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from South Dakota for his courtesy.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I ask for a vote upon the pending amendment, which is the amendment offered by me to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that the bill has not yet been taken up in the regular way.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thought the bill was before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator withdrew his request before the bill was taken up in favor of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not withdraw it; I simply withheld the request in order that a small bill might be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was not regularly taken up.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then I renew my request that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 19115, known as the omnibus claims bill.

I desire to say that we have discussed more or less now for a number of days the question of incorporating the French spoliation claims into this bill. I am anxious to have that matter disposed of one way or the other, because in a large degree it will determine whether or not we are to go on with this bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, before we take a vote on any of the features of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I think we ought to have a fuller attendance of the Senate, and I make the point——

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Massachusetts has said to me several times that, so far as my amendment to the amendment proposed by him is concerned, he would not ask for a roll call. I desire to have that amendment to the amendment disposed of. Then I should not want to take up the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts without his being in the Chamber, and I shall send for him.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I supposed that the amendments would follow in natural order and that after the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts had been disposed of the question would recur on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. If that be not the case, I see no necessity for taking the time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to have a vote on the amendment offered by me to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say a word in regard to the matter of premium, which was alluded to the other day. The war premium, as was held in the Alabama cases, was paid on account of the war, on account of the danger, in one case from the Confederate cruisers and in the other from the cruisers of France, and they were obliged to pay the excessive premiums which constituted a part of their loss because of the situation of France. That is all I wanted to say, merely to explain that. I am perfectly ready now to take a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. On the main amendment, as amended, I should like to have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, while the calling of the yeas and nays may automatically disclose the absence of a quorum, I make the point, technically, that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	du Pont	McCumber	Shively
Bankhead	Fletcher	McLean	Simmons
Bourne	Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Heiskell	Myers	Smoot
Brown	Hitchcock	Oliver	Stephenson
Bryan	Jackson	Owen	Sutherland
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Page	Swanson
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Paynter	Thornton
Chamberlain	Johnston, Tex.	Perkins	Tillman
Clapp	Jones	Perky	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Poindexter	Williams
Cullom	La Follette	Pomerene	Works
Cummins	Lippitt	Root
Dillingham	Lodge	Sanders

Mr. THORNTON. I announce the necessary absence from the Chamber of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of a death in his family. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as amended on motion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, as a matter of justice to myself, I am glad to say that as the French spoliation claims amendment is now proposed, if it were here as an independent proposal I should vote for it. But representing the committee, and in view of the policy of the committee, and the rules adopted by the committee in framing this bill, and as it was decided there that it was inexpedient to attach the French spoliation claims to this bill, inasmuch as it would simply mean the defeat of the omnibus claims bill, I shall, simply because of my belief that it is inexpedient, vote against the amendment to incorporate them on this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I quite fall in with the idea indicated by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], the chairman of the Committee on Claims. I shall not at this time address myself to the merits, or so-called merits, of the French spoliation claims, because in my judgment it is inexpedient for some of us to vote for the incorporation of these claims in this bill at the present time. As the bill came from the House it contained several hundred thousand dollars of so-called Southern war claims, the validity of which had been adjudicated by the Court of Claims. As a part of the policy announced by the Senator from South Dakota all of the individual claims of that class were omitted from the bill and only such items included as related to the injury or destruction of churches or schoolhouses.

Many of us interested in the passage of the bill in its original form acquiesced in that under the belief that we thereby facilitated the payment of some part of the indebtedness, and we simplified the issues that would arise subsequently, not only in regard to the individual claims in favor of southern claimants, but that we would also be in a more independent attitude with reference to these French spoliation claims. So purely as a matter of legislative procedure many of us will vote against the consideration of these claims at the present time.

There has been developed a sharp and irreconcilable conflict between the two Houses in reference to the payment of these claims, and at least two bills failed of enactment because both classes of claims were largely represented in the same bill. So I may say that now—and I think I speak not only for myself but for a number of other Senators on this side of the Chamber who are similarly situated—that wholly without reference to the merits or demerits of the so-called French spoliation claims, we deem it inexpedient to vote to put them on this bill at the present time.

There has been no claims bill since 1907, and while a great many reasons have cooperated to produce that result, none has contributed more than the fact of the so-called French spoliation claims being made a part of the bill. Their merits are distinct, if they have any merits, and I say they have none. But I will devote a little time to that at a later stage of their consideration.

But now, having acquiesced in the elimination of all the claims that come from the section of the country from which many of us on this side come, we feel it would be nothing but fair to test out the sentiment of Congress in the matter of paying these claims of churches and schoolhouses. They are in a class distinct from other claims that are usually included in this bill. They were never founded in absolute right. They were never recognized for some 30 years after the war. A sentiment developed here, under the leadership of the late Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, in favor of recognizing these claims as sort of a benevolence. I think it was an egregious blunder. The people of the South are not particularly concerned about what churches and schoolhouses were destroyed 50 years ago. That whole section has been rehabilitated entirely beyond the dream of the wildest friend that section had. These things are not at all essential to the prosperity of the community, but, having been allowed and recognized as claims, individual communities have taken them up, and they feel that the same treatment should be accorded to those, the validity of which has now been adjudged, that has been accorded to the same class of claims on former occasions.

It is to get rid of that so-called exhibition of benevolence on the part of Congress that I have been inclined to agree to the proposition made by the Committee on Claims. The people of the South did not need such an exhibition of generosity on the part of the late Senator from Massachusetts to convince them that they had rights that were to be respected and duties that were to be discharged.

The reconciliation of the sections and of the classes did not depend upon a few dollars here and a few dollars there for a destroyed or damaged church. That was a mere bagatelle, and it has come into prominence only by reason of the fact that payments of that character have been made, and claim agents have become busy and have stirred up claims locally, and that reacts on us here, and we find ourselves continually prodded for our negligence in failing to get recognition for claims that now remain, whereas similar claims have received favorable recognition.

As I desire to reduce the number of conflicts in connection with this bill and come down to a basis where we can fairly and independently consider the merits of the so-called French spoliation claims and open up a way to increase the independence of the other side of the Chamber to investigate the merits of the so-called southern war claims, I think this bill ought to pass just in accordance with the plan laid down by the Committee on Claims. I shall therefore vote against the consideration of the spoliation claims at this time, without indicating in detail the reasons why I do so.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I devoted considerable time to a discussion of these claims upon a former occasion. Having talked with a number of Senators, I am convinced that it is not the purpose of the Senate to incorporate these claims into the bill at this time; and not wishing to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing the merits of the claims, believing that they will not be made a part of the bill, I therefore will not discuss them at this time, as otherwise I would.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator from Kansas takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. Did not the United States Government receive from the French Government a large amount of money for the purpose of paying these claims?

Mr. BRISTOW. It did not.

Mr. LODGE. It received its equivalent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have always thought that the United States did. In the Louisiana treaty there were some three and one-half million dollars——

Mr. BRISTOW. That is not the treaty upon which these claims are based.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may not be; but under the Louisiana treaty there was an amount—I forget precisely what it was, but I think it was three million and a fraction dollars—that the Government of the United States assumed as claims of Frenchmen against the United States Government, in consequence of the war de facto, although never declared by either nation; and that is the point to which I am referring.

Mr. BRISTOW. That does not relate to these claims. It relates to a different matter.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, what was done was this: In consideration of our undertaking the payment of our claimants, France undertook the payment of her claimants against us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, and that was a part of the same treaty.

Mr. LODGE. No; I think that was an earlier treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. BRISTOW. That was a separate treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But my recollection is that in the sum total we had to pay for Louisiana; in addition to the $15,000,000, which we paid in cash, there were some three million and a fraction of dollars that were included, which we assumed for our own citizens who had claims against France. I do not mean for French subjects who had claims against us.

Mr. BRISTOW. That was another treaty and related to a different matter, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], which I transfer to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer it to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. Except for that, I would vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WARREN. I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON], who would vote for this amendment, and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT. I again announce the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE]. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bradley	du Pont	McLean	Thornton
Brandegee	Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Wetmore
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Williams
Clapp	Lippitt	Page
Cullom	Lodge	Penrose
Dillingham	McCumber	Root

NAYS—41.

Ashurst	Curtis	La Follette	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Bourne	Fletcher	Myers	Stephenson
Bristow	Gronna	Perkins	Sutherland
Brown	Heiskell	Perky	Swanson
Bryan	Hitchcock	Poindexter	Tillman
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnston, Tex.	Sanders	Works
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Shively
Crawford	Kenyon	Simmons
Cummins	Kern	Smith, Ariz.

NOT VOTING—32.

Bacon	Fall	Massey	Reed
Borah	Foster	Nelson	Richardson
Briggs	Gamble	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Catron	Gardner	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Chilton	Gore	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Owen	Stone
Crane	Jackson	Paynter	Warren
Culberson	Lea	Percy	Watson.

So Mr. LODGE's amendment as amended was rejected.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to give notice that I will ask the Senate to resume consideration of the omnibus claims bill after the routine morning business to-morrow, and hope we may then be able to dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William I. McKenney, pastor of the Wesley Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we come to acknowledge Thy sovereignty and express our thanksgiving and praise to Thee for Thy manifold blessings. Thou hast said, If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not. Give to these, Thy servants, wisdom and righteousness in the discharge of their duties, and breadth of sympathy and vision. We pray for God's blessing upon Thy servant, our Chief Magistrate. Bless our President elect. Preserve his life and health to enter upon the duties of his great office, and God grant that his administration may be a conspicuous success and a blessing to all the people. Command Thy blessing, we beseech Thee, upon Thy servant, the Chaplain of the House. Lay Thy healing hand upon him and restore him to health and strength. These blessings we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MALBY.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, January 26, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, late a Representative from the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, H. R. 27941.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is, I may say, a straight appropriation bill. It carries very little if any new legislation. There are one or two items in the bill which have not been in the Army appropriation bill before, one of which is a provision increasing the pay of officers engaged in aviation. It may be remembered that in the last session of this Congress the House passed a bill increasing the pay of these aviation officers. That bill went to the Senate and has not been acted upon there, and we have thought that the matter is of sufficient importance to include it now in this bill.

There is also an appropriation of $25,000 for the international shooting match at Camp Perry, Ohio. It makes provision for the entertainment of the rifle teams from other countries, and provides that they shall bring in their paraphernalia, in the way of arms, and so forth, free of duty. I think those are the only two items in the bill that may be called new.

The bill carries an appropriation of $93,830,177, which is a reduction of $1,717,453 of the estimate.

Last year the bill carried an appropriation of $90,907,466. This bill is an increase of about two and one-half million dollars over last year's bill.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the aggregate increase in the pay of officers?

Mr. HAY. There is no increase except in the pay of aviation officers.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How large is that increase?

Mr. HAY. It will be about $30,000.

Last year the committee, in making appropriations for the pay of the Army, thought they had provided a sufficient amount for that purpose, but during the present fiscal year the Army has been materially increased, and there will be a deficiency of $2,500,000 in the pay of the Army, as I am informed by the War Department.

There will also be a deficiency of about $750,000 in the subsistence of the Army, due to a great extent to the increase of the price of the articles of food which go to make up the Army ration. For that reason the present bill is increased beyond what it was last year.

Also last year the usual appropriation of $1,000,000 for the maneuvers of the Organized Militia was in a separate bill, because of the necessity of getting it passed by the 1st of July. For that reason the bill of last year would have been $1,000,000 more, and the expenses of the Army were in reality $1,000,000 more than were carried in that bill.

I think I have stated the salient points in the bill, and unless somebody desires to ask me a question, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill which authorizes expenditures for polo tournaments, race-track events, horse shows, and things of that kind?

Mr. HAY. There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is there any language in the bill that would prohibit it different from what has been in other bills?

Mr. HAY. There has been no change in the bill in regard to polo tournaments. So far as I know there has never been in the bill any provision for polo tournaments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like to read from a letter which I have received——

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HAY. I can only yield to one gentleman at a time. I have yielded to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, under date of August 23, 1912, in which he states that there are on file in the office of the Auditor for the War Department vouchers paid by disbursing officers of the Army on account of expenses in connection with the attendance of officers, enlisted men, and civilians upon polo tournaments, race-track events, and horse shows, which were paid from the appropriations for "Regular supplies, Quartermaster's Department," "Incidental expenses, Quartermaster's Department," "Transportation of the Army and its supplies," "Barracks and quarters," "Subsistence of the Army," and "Mileage to officers."

That would indicate that money is being expended from some appropriation, made, I assume, in the Army appropriation bill, and it is on that account that I make my inquiry.

Mr. HAY. I will say that all those appropriations are carried in this bill, but under what particular provision of those items these expenses have been paid I am unable to say.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then I understand the gentleman has not intended that any appropriation carried in the bill should be expended for these purposes, and if the proper amendment is proposed at a suitable place in the bill, and if the gentleman shall be convinced that money is being so expended, I presume he will consent to an amendment prohibiting it.

Mr. HAY. I would if it was demonstrated that these polo tournaments are held for the benefit of the public and not for the benefit of the service.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There are a few other items in the bill that I would like to bring to the attention of the chairman, but perhaps I had better wait until the bill is taken up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAY. I will answer them now.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In regard to the expenditure of the appropriation carried in this bill which has reference to commutation—I think it is on page 13 of the bill, commutation of quarters to commissioned officers, and so forth. I would like to ask the gentleman to explain, if he will, how that is expended. As I understand it, if an officer is entitled by his rank to quarters at a military post of, say, five rooms, if he is detailed at some point other than a military post, for instance, at the War Department in the city of Washington, that he receives in cash on the basis of five rooms, $12 a month, which would be $60. He receives also in cash for the lighting and heating of five rooms, though he may only occupy one room or two rooms. Will the gentleman explain how that is?

Mr. HAY. I will state that the item to which the gentleman calls my attention refers to officers, dental surgeons, and so forth, who have not quarters at a military post and who have to have hired quarters. They get commutation of quarters in accordance with their rank, a second lieutenant getting two rooms and a first lieutenant three rooms, and so forth.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does not a captain get five rooms?

Mr. HAY. No; a captain gets four rooms, a major five rooms, and so forth. It is fixed by the rank of the officer, each room is $12 a month, and they are paid in cash when not stationed at military posts.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And are they not always paid for heat and light for that number of rooms, regardless of the fact whether they occupy that number of rooms or not?

Mr. HAY. The commutation of heat and light is based on the number of rooms which they are allowed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They receive it for fuel in the summer months the same as in winter months, do they not?

Mr. HAY. I think not, but I am not positive about that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not true in many instances a great many officers are drawing $75 and $100 a month in cash in lieu of quarters and light and heat?

Mr. HAY. I suppose they are—a colonel, a major, a lieutenant colonel.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not true that there are a large number of officers in the city of Washington, as many as 175, that are drawing money in lieu of quarters and for fuel and light?

Mr. HAY. All officers in the city who are not stationed at the military post here at the Washington Barracks are drawing their commutation of quarters and allowances for fuel and light.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will discuss the matter further under the five-minute rule, and will make some further observations.

Mr. KAHN. If the chairman of the committee will allow me, I think there is a provision in the Military Academy bill which permits the purchase of horses of a certain size, which are used as polo ponies at West Point. That is allowed by law.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from South Dakota was talking about the expenses of the polo tournaments held not at West Point, but at other places; one was held here last summer. Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States, Article II, section 3, provides:

He—

may on extraordinary occasions convene both Houses or either of them.

The word "extraordinary" in its usual and ordinary signification means beyond or exceeding the common order or degree. An "extraordinary occasion" as thus construed would be an uncommon, an unwonted, an unusual occasion. This was the view of the older commentators.

St. George Tucker, in his comments on Blackstone's Commentaries, volume 1, page 344, says:

The power of the President to convene either or both Houses of Congress was a provision indispensably necessary in a Government organized as the Federal Government is by the Constitution. Occasions may occur during the recess of Congress for taking the most vigorous and decisive measures to repel injury or provide for defense; Congress only is competent to these objects; the President may therefore convene them for that purpose. Or it may happen that an important treaty hath been negotiated during the recess of the Senate, and their advice be required thereupon without delay, either that the ratification may be exchanged in due time or for some other important reason. On such extraordinary occasions as these if there were not a power lodged in the President to convene the Senate, or the Congress, as the case might require, the affairs of the Nation might be thrown into confusion and perplexity, or worse.

Story on the Constitution, volume 2, section 1562, says:

The power to convene Congress on extraordinary occasions is indispensable to the proper operation and even safety of the Government. Occasions may occur in the recess of Congress requiring the Government to take vigorous measures to repel foreign aggressions, depredations, and direct hostilities; to provide adequate means to mitigate or overcome unexpected calamities; to suppress insurrections; and to provide for innumerable other important exigencies arising out of the intercourse and revolutions among nations.

In practice the earlier Presidents in summoning both Houses recognized this interpretation.

John Adams, May 15, 1797, by proclamation convened Congress, stating: "Whereas an extraordinary occasion exists for convening Congress." In his message giving reasons he cites the refusal of the French Republic to receive the American minister until the United States had acceded to their demands for "redress of grievances," the decrees of the Directory under which our commerce was being destroyed, and the necessity under the circumstances of strengthening our Army and Navy. In reply to this message both the Senate and the House passed "addresses" to the President approving the action in convening Congress "on this momentous occasion."

James Madison, May 22, 1809, convened Congress in special session, the "critical state of our foreign relations" being the occasion. War was threatened with both France and England, whose outrages on our seamen, depredations on our commerce, and contemptuous disregard for our rights were continually augmenting.

The War of 1812 with Great Britain made it necessary for President Madison to again call Congress in special session May 25, 1813, for the purpose of strengthening our Army and Navy and providing a revenue to meet the extraordinary demands of a conflict with the most powerful nation in the world.

Martin Van Buren, September 4, 1837, issued a proclamation convening Congress in extraordinary session, stating that "great and weighty matters claiming the consideration of the Congress of the United States form an extraordinary occasion for convening them." The suspension of specie payment by the banks and the panic which ensued made it necessary to provide for these "unexpected exigencies," which were "indispensably necessary to the public service before the regular period of your meeting."

William Henry Harrison, March 17, 1841, issued a proclamation calling Congress together May 31, 1841, to consider "sundry important and weighty matters, principally growing out of the conditions of the revenue and finances of the country."

President Harrison did not live until the date when Congress was to convene. He died April 4, 1841.

President Tyler, who succeeded to the Presidency, in his special-session message said he did not feel it would be becoming to him to disturb what had been ordered by his predecessor, and was "most happy" to have the counsel and advice of Congress "as to the best mode of extricating the Government and the country from the embarrassments weighing heavily on both."

Franklin Pierce, August, 1856, called Congress together, his proclamation stating:

Whereas whilst hostilities exist with various Indian tribes on the remote frontiers of the United States, and whilst in other respects the public peace is seriously threatened, Congress has adjourned without granting the necessary supplies for the Army, depriving the Executive of the power to perform his duty in relation to the common defense and security, an extraordinary occasion has thus arisen for assembling the two Houses of Congress.

Abraham Lincoln, July 4, 1861, convened Congress in extraordinary session. The Southern States had seceded, Sumter had been fired upon, war was then in progress, armies were in the field, a blockade had been ordered, and the President called upon Congress to give him "the legal means for making the contest a short and decisive one."

Rutherford B. Hayes, October 15, 1877, called Congress together because the preceding Congress had adjourned without making appropriations for the Army, the Navy, and to defray the expenses of the United States courts.

Again, March 18, 1879, he called Congress together because the Forty-fifth Congress made no appropriations for the Army or for the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government.

Grover Cleveland called a special session August 8, 1893, his message stating:

The existence of an alarming and extraordinary business situation, involving the welfare and prosperity of all our people, has constrained me to call together in extra session the people's Representatives in Congress.

It will be seen from this review that on only 10 occasions during the first century of the Republic had its Presidents exercised their power to convene Congress in extra session. War, foreign aggressions, widespread panic, or a failure to make the necessary appropriations to carry on the Government were the reasons assigned. There will be no contention that the existence of any of these conditions would not constitute an "extraordinary occasion" justifying the exercise of the Executive prerogative.

The few instances of the exercise of this power by our Presidents during the first century of our history, and the facts existing in each case clearly justifying the call, merit the language of Justice Miller in his lectures on the Constitution:

The power of the President to convene both Houses, or either of them, on extraordinary occasions has been rarely exercised, and certainly has not been abused during the history of the Government.

While the exercise of the power during these years is clearly justified in calling both Houses, it is by no means so clear with regard to the exercise of the power in calling one alone. No President has ever convened the lower House alone, but special sessions of the Senate have been frequently called from the beginning of our Government down to the present time. Washington called the Senate in special session four times, John Adams twice, and Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Jackson, Van Buren, Tyler, and Polk once each. Indeed, the practice has continued down to the present day.

The occasion for these calls for a special session of the Senate has been the necessity of action by the Senate in confirming the important appointments of the President. Especially does it appear necessary when an administration changes. The President assuming his duties March 4, and the regular session of the Senate not occurring until the following December, the executive department can not be fully organized without the appointment and confirmation of the Cabinet officers. Hence it has been the practice to call special sessions of the Senate for the purpose of securing these important confirmations. While the exercise of the Executive prerogative is not so clearly justified in these cases, it has been considered indispensable so long as the Constitution makes no provision for dealing otherwise with such exigencies. It has therefore never been questioned.

In later years we find a new practice with regard to the calling of both Houses established which constitutes in reality an entire abandonment of the "extraordinary occasion" requirement for the exercise of the power. Our later Presidents call Congress in special session whenever in their judgment any important reason exists for so doing. Thus, William McKinley, March 15, 1897, called Congress in special session. In his message he said:

Regretting the necessity which has required me to call you together, I feel that your assembling in extraordinary session is indispensable because of the condition in which we find the revenues of the Government. It is conceded that its current expenditures are greater than its receipts, and that such a condition has existed for now more than three years.

It was true that the revenues of the Government were not equal to the expenditures. Prior deficits had been met, however, by bond issues, which, while undesirable, were not sufficiently serious to constitute an extraordinary emergency. To have awaited from March until December would not have materially changed conditions or seriously injured the country. The bulk of the President's special session message, however, was devoted to a discussion of the tariff, and it was generally understood that Congress was called together for the purpose of revising the tariff.

It may well be doubted if tariff revision under any circumstances can constitute an "extraordinary occasion" within the meaning of the Constitution. When it is remembered that such action is in response to a political rather than an essential or inherently justifiable demand, its wisdom as well as its constitutionality may fairly be questioned. It will hardly be contended that a seeming political advantage will justify the exercise of a doubtful constitutional power, and it may be safely assumed that no such exercise of power can in the long run help the party in whose supposed interest it is made.

The unwise precedent set by President McKinley was followed by Theodore Roosevelt November 9, 1903, who convened Congress in extraordinary session to "consider the legislation necessary to put into operation the commercial treaty with Cuba."

The treaty had been ratified by the Senate and by Cuba, but its reciprocal features contemplated legislation by Congress. In this case there was hardly a pretense that the occasion was "extraordinary." The President did not even allude to it as such. He merely desired early action and took this means of securing it on a pet measure of no general interest or particular importance.

It is unquestionably true that it is entirely within the power of the President to determine what is an "extraordinary occasion." Thus Watson on the Constitution (vol. 2, p. 1001), a late work, discussing the exercise of this power, says:

> The term "extraordinary occasions" would imply that the framers of the Constitution thought that some urgent necessity might arise, when it would be necessary for Congress, or either branch thereof, to be called together, and they accordingly conferred upon the President the power to do so at such times. What is an extraordinary occasion is for the President to determine. A State constitution by a similar provision authorized the governor to call the State legislature together, and it was held that though the governor might err in doing so there was no power to prevent him or to correct the error. Another State constitution contained the exact language on this subject which is found in the Constitution of the United States—that is, it authorized the governor to call the legislature, or either branch thereof, together on "extraordinary occasions." The governor having exercised his authority and called the legislature together, it was claimed by a very large part of the people of the State that no "extraordinary occasion" existed, and that in consequence the call was invalid and the proposed legislation unnecessary. The court said the fact that a large majority of the people of the State might not consider that an "extraordinary occasion" existed, or that they believed that the legislation which it was proposed should be enacted was unnecessary, vicious, or injurious to the interests of the State, would not justify a court in declaring that the governor had violated his constitutional prerogative in calling the legislature together.

Whatever view may be taken as to the justification for calling Congress in extraordinary session in any given case, there is no way to legally contest it. The President is the sole judge as to what constitutes an extraordinary occasion, and his only restraint in the exercise of the power is moral. The determination of what is his duty under the Constitution he is sworn to support and obey ought to be a sufficient guide. If he shall determine to disregard his constitutional duty or to lightly treat its obligations, he has the power to do so, but it will not redound to his credit or to the credit of his administration.

William Howard Taft, March 16, 1909, convened Congress "in order to enable it to give immediate consideration to the revision of the Dingley Tariff Act." Conditions had so changed, he said, as to require a readjustment of rates. The revenues were not sufficient to pay the authorized expenditures, the successful party was pledged to revision, the country expected it, and the suspense as to the nature of the change caused a halt in business. "For these reasons I have deemed the present to be an extraordinary occasion within the meaning of the Constitution justifying and requiring the calling of an extra session."

It is perhaps needless to say that none of the matters stated as constituting an "extraordinary occasion," nor all of them together, justified the call. There was no emergency that under a fair interpretation demanded immediate legislation. There was no condition shown to exist which might not reasonably have been borne from March until December. It may fairly be stated that the revision of the tariff could have been better and more satisfactorily accomplished had the President allowed the matter to wait until the regular session. If there is any one subject of legislation that can and should await the opportunity for full consideration and calm deliberation it is a revision of the tariff.

President Taft again exercised his prerogative by assembling the Sixty-second Congress in special session April 4, 1911. His purpose was to secure the adoption of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement with Canada.

In concluding the negotiations—

He said—

> the representatives of the two countries bound themselves to use their utmost efforts to bring about the tariff changes provided for in the agreement by concurrent legislation at Washington and Ottawa. I have felt it my duty, therefore, not to acquiesce in relegation of action until the opening of Congress in December, but to use my constitutional prerogative and convoke the Sixty-second Congress in extra session in order that there shall be no break in continuity in considering and acting upon this most important subject.

President Taft endeavored to secure the approval of this trade agreement by the Sixty-first Congress. It passed the House February 14, 1911, a majority of the Republicans voting against it. A determined opposition to the bill developed in the Senate, whereupon the President announced that if no action was taken on the bill before Congress came to an end, March 4, he would call a special session of the Sixty-second Congress to pass upon it. The statement, however, had no effect, and the Senate took no action. The special session was called and the President secured the passage of the reciprocity pact by the Sixty-second Congress, July 22, 1911.

No action was taken by Canada until July 29, when Laurier dissolved Parliament and appealed to the people. The vote in Canada was taken September 21 following, when the Conservatives won an almost unprecedented victory and secured a new Parliament overwhelmingly opposed to reciprocity.

It will be seen that there was no occasion for haste. It was apparent that the President thought the chance of passage in the United States was better early and that the influence of successful action here would be helpful in Canada. Such considerations were far from constituting a justification of the exercise of the power of calling an extraordinary session of Congress. The President might well have acquiesced in "relegation of action until the opening of Congress in December," and it would have been fully as wise to have allowed a "break of continuity" here as in Canada.

The country is now at peace. Our people are enjoying an unprecedented measure of prosperity. Business conditions are good. The largest crops ever produced have been harvested. There is more money on deposit in our banks than ever before. Our exports and imports are the largest ever recorded, and the balance of trade is strongly in our favor. Our revenues exceed our expenditures, and we have a surplus in the Treasury. It is vehemently declared that these conditions will and must continue. Nevertheless it is announced by the President elect that he will summon Congress early in the year in extraordinary session to revise the tariff. And this is to be done not because of any announced constitutional sanction but because his party associates demand it. Indeed, it is almost ludicrous to consider that the President in November announces that an "extraordinary occasion" will arise for the exercise of his constitutional prerogative the next March or April. In effect this is a determination that, no matter what conditions then may exist in the country, the political pressure of his party associates for tariff revision as a party policy, in fulfillment of party pledges, constitutes an "extraordinary occasion" within the contemplation of the Constitution for calling an extra session of Congress.

It cost the country in increased expenditures for the extra session of 1911 probably more than a quarter of a million dollars. For session employees of the House and Senate the cost was $33,591.64. For mileage it was $183,480.20. Other expenditures, such as increased amounts for stationery, materials, light, heat, and so forth, were incurred, the amount of which can not be readily ascertained. It is not probable that the contemplated extra session will cost less.

Have those who have advised the President elect that it would be good politics to call the extra session considered this feature? Are those Democrats who are pledged to rebuke the "mad extravagance" of the Republicans ready to stand responsible for this utterly needless expense? Is a quarter of a million dollars less in their consideration than the salary of a superfluous clerk? An opinion is somewhat generally entertained that the lavish and almost limitless expenditures for investigations, which have marked if not distinguished the history of the present House, were incurred more for party advantage than for justifiable ends. Will it be wise now to add this large additional expenditure whose only possible purpose is pure politics?

It will be claimed that this call of an extra session to revise the tariff is but the call of the people, to which faithful and obedient statesmen should immediately respond. But the people, or at least a large majority of them, do not want any such revision of the tariff as is promised by the Democratic Party.

It should begin to be understood by the leaders of that party that it was neither their principles or their candidate that caused their success. It was Republican division and not Democratic worth that brought about Republican defeat.

Of the three parties which really contended for the supremacy at the last election two declared unequivocally for the policy of protection. The other declared against it. A majority of over a million votes was cast for the parties which declared against a tariff for revenue revision. The popular vote for Mr. Wilson was 6,303,000; that for Mr. Taft was 3,439,000; and that for Mr. Roosevelt was 4,168,000. The combined vote for Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt, or the total vote for protection, was 7,608,000, a majority on the vote cast for protection as against tariff for revenue of 1,305,000. The vote of Mr. Wilson with the normal increase as measured by the increase of population should have been 6,931,000. Instead, it was 628,000 less, and 104,919 less than Mr. Bryan received in 1908.

In view of these facts there is little appearance of an imperious, unappeasable, immediately-to-be-answered demand for tariff revision. Indeed, when it is considered that the total vote of 1912 was only 155,000 larger than the vote for 1908, despite the fact that two new States had been admitted and suffrage to women had been granted in California and Washington, and that if the additional vote of those States be omitted, the total vote of 1912 was smaller than in 1908, notwithstanding the fact that during that period the population of the country had increased 8 per cent; if, in addition, it is remembered that the total vote cast at the last election, including the Socialist, Prohibition, and Socialist-Labor vote, was only 15,041,000, while the number of males of voting age in the United States was 26,999,000, it is apparent both that no great interest was taken in the demand for tariff revision, and that the less than one-quarter of our total voting population who demand such action ought reasonably to be satisfied if action be deferred until reached in the ordinary course of orderly procedure.

The only avowed purpose of the extra session is to revise the tariff. That the tariff needs revision may be freely admitted, but that surely can wait until the regular session. The country is at least not suffering under our present tariff. It may be too high in some of its items, but that will always be the case. It may be too low in some particulars, but such conditions will always exist. Under it as it now is we are prospering mightily. All admit the year just closed was the golden year of the Nation's progress and prosperity. We have ample revenue. There is no deficit. Business is sound. There is no panic. There is no sudden emergency calling for action; no "occasion" justifying the exercise of the "extraordinary" powers of the Government.

The President elect in his letter of acceptance said that as the business of the country had been built up on protective-tariff schedules "its foundations must not be too radically or too suddenly disturbed." Later during the campaign he said:

> These changes can not be brought about suddenly. We can not arbitrarily turn right about face and pull our policy up by its roots and cast it aside while we plant another in virgin soil. A great industrial system has been built up in this country under the fosterage of the Government behind a wall of unproductive taxes. This change must be brought about first here, and then there, and then there again. We must move from step to step with as much prudence as resolution.

These words were fair words; they were wise words; they were words of moderation and wisdom. It will scarcely be contended that they were not honestly spoken. It can hardly be believed they were uttered for campaign purposes only; that they were only intended to allay alarm, to win confidence, to secure votes, and that the real purpose was something exactly opposite. And yet that is exactly the reproach the persons who have induced the President to call this extra session bring upon him. His words before the election promised moderation, deliberation, consideration. His act will belie all this and will do the very things he promised not to do.

One wonders if history is again to repeat itself. Grover Cleveland in his letter of acceptance said:

> We will not destroy any industry; we will remodel the tariff; we will give lower duties; we will even the burdens of the people; and we will give freer raw material.

And yet when President he became the earnest advocate not of freer but of free raw materials, denounced the Wilson-Gorman law as "party perfidy and party dishonor," and refused to sign it, not because it was too radical but because it was not radical enough. Nevertheless, as it was, Senator Hoar declared in Congress that the experiment of radical tariff revision made under the Cleveland administration cost the people of this country more in dollars and cents than the entire cost of the Civil War.

What may be expected at the coming extra session in the present state of mind of the dominant leaders may be determined by the words of Mr. UNDERWOOD, leader of the majority, who is reported as saying recently, "The bills already passed by the House indicate the line of revision that will be followed." These bills put on the free list nearly $6,000,000,000 of products now on the dutiable list. They greatly reduce the duty on $9,000,000,000 more of our products. And these bills left many of the schedules untouched which it is now proposed shall be "revised."

Yet Mr. Wilson declares that they "do not want to disturb the industry of the country; we are here not to destroy." And yet with such an announced program of radical, revolutionary revision he yields to the pressure of politicians, whom he is unwilling or unable to resist.

The Springfield Republican refers to the past tariff activities of the present House as "more of a study in political jockeying than in tariff making." Political success seemed so desirable, so deliciously sweet, so rapturously blissful, that the end to be attained appeared to justify almost any means to secure it. But the hour of responsibility will end the pleasant pastime of jockeying, and the stage play, which both diverted and deceived, must cease when in the cold, clear light of open day the handling of elemental forces begins.

The coming administration holds in its hands four years of our country's history. It may write on its pages much good or much evil. To an extent that is not realized the policies of an administration affect the happiness of the people. It is sometimes lightly said that it makes little difference which party succeeds or who is elected, but that is a mistaken idea. In some manner every administration touches every citizen—the humblest as well as the highest. It reaches every hearthstone; it is felt in remotest regions. In the success of the coming administration every patriotic American citizen must be interested. For its success every one not blinded by partisanship or actuated by sinister motives must wish. Every wrong step, every mistake, every blunder hurts us all, and in the glory that may come from continued or increased progress and prosperity we can not help but share.

Extra sessions of Congress called for political purposes to serve party ends have never brought satisfaction to the Executive, credit to the administration, or benefit to the country. The proposed extra session will be no exception. Looking merely for party advantage, Republicans might view with complacency this first blunder of the new administration; but as Americans, with the best interests of the people at heart, it is difficult to see any possible good to our country in the proposed extra session of Congress.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, when the Army appropriation bill was before the House last summer my colleagues on this side of the House and myself endeavored to point out the fact that unless the items for pay were increased there would positively be a deficit this year. Our prediction has come true. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], said in his statement that the deficit is due to the increase in the Army. It is true that the Army was increased, but the order for the increase was issued on the 30th of March, 1911, some months before the Army bill was finally passed; and the fact that the order for the increase had been made before the bill had passed was all the more reason why the amendments offered by my colleagues and myself should have been adopted. But the political campaign is over, and the present bill carries the amounts which the real necessities of the Army demand.

The bill of last summer carried considerable legislation. One of the provisions was for an increase of the enlistment period. In the San Francisco Chronicle, a few weeks ago, I noticed an article to the effect that there had been a considerable falling off in the number of enlistments at that point since the new law went into effect on the 1st of last November. Having read the item, I took occasion to find out just what that falling off might be. Of course, one can only make a comparison of the enlistments and reenlistments that occurred in the months of November and December of previous years.

I find that the total enlistments and reenlistments for 1910 was 6,331 during the months of November and December. The total enlistments and reenlistments during these two months in 1911 was 7,559. The total enlistments and reenlistments during the months of November and December, 1912, fell to the remarkably low figure of 3,677, or less than 50 per cent of what it had been during these two months in the year before. Again the predictions of the minority have come true. The long period of enlistment does not meet with the favor of the men who are likely to enlist in the Army. I firmly believe that it will become necessary by law to change the enlistment period.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HAY. The present period of enlistment is, under the law, seven years.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Three years of which are served in the reserves.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff insisted upon having that reserve feature, thereby adding the three years?

Mr. KAHN. The Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff did want a reserve period. Their preference was for a three-year enlistment period, with two years in the reserves; but when it became evident that it was impossible to secure a three-year enlistment period, then they advocated the four-year period, which a majority of the conferees had agreed upon, plus three years in the reserves. During the summer I had occasion to speak with many of the enlisted men regarding this matter of the enlistment period, and I found that practically all of them preferred the short-enlistment period. Personally, I feel that many men should be allowed to retire from the Army at the end of the first year. I feel that where a man finds that he has no aptitude for the service he should be allowed to retire at the end of the first year, without being compelled to purchase his discharge. In that way the men who would have had a year's experience would go out into the body of the citizenship of the country with a friendly feeling toward the Army. I feel that if the call to the colors should come, a very large percentage of those men would respond in case they were required for actual service in the field.

Many of the desertions in the Army are due to the fact that young men who enlist, after they have been in the service a few months, become homesick and want to get out. If they felt that they could get an honorable discharge at the end of the year, I believe that very few of them would ever desert. They would practically all remain. A three-year term with two years in the reserves should be the longest in the Army, in my judgment. You would find that men would continue to enlist just as they had been enlisting before this increased term became the law. I hope, however, that the system which the law provided for will have a thorough test, and if it should develop that the falling off in the number of enlistments shall continue, then I hope that the Committee on Military Affairs will promptly bring in another bill to reduce the term of enlistment.

Mr. MURDOCK. What does the gentleman mean by a thorough test—what length of time?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I should say a year. A year would undoubtedly develop the fact very thoroughly as to whether the present law is a success or not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then if the present rate of diminution, which has developed in November and December, should continue for one year the gentleman would offer an amendment to cure that?

Mr. KAHN. I should introduce a bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. To reduce the term of service to one year?

Mr. KAHN. No; to three years; but I would have a proviso to give the soldier the privilege of taking an honorable discharge at the end of one year if he should desire to do so.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. I would ask the gentleman whether they have been able to find from the recruiting officers any cause that they can put their finger on? I will put the question in another way, and ask whether the fact that the soldier is to receive no compensation during the three years of reserve is not the reason for the falling off rather than the length of service? I want to say that I agree with the gentleman that it may be it is the length of enlistment that may have produced this falling off, but there is also the question there of three years of service in the reserves without compensation.

Mr. KAHN. I have not had information upon that point, and therefore I stated that I would give the present law an opportunity to work out its own salvation. If, after the end of the first year, it should develop that the enlistments still continue to fall off and that the reason for the falling off is the one suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], then the correction should be made as to that. I will state that, having spoken on that subject with a number of enlisted men, I believe it is the long period of service that is responsible for the falling off.

Mr. Chairman, there are a number of matters contained in the bill of a year ago that should be given a thorough opportunity to be tried. There was a provision in the sections providing for a Quartermaster Corps that, I think, will develop a condition that ought to be carefully studied. Perhaps I should say that it will develop an improvement that ought to be worked out right through the Army. I refer to the matter of having one list with all the officers upon it, with rank upon that list from the date of their commission. There is a grievous complaint in the Army that officers frequently get promotions over their seniors, due to the branch of the service which the officer enters. For instance, one officer will graduate from West Point, say, in 1902. He goes into a certain branch of the service. Four or six years afterwards another officer will graduate from West Point who possibly will have been appointed from the same congressional district. That second officer goes into another branch of the service where promotions are much more rapid, and in the course of a few years he is a captain, while the man who graduated four or six years earlier is still a lieutenant. That condition is bound to create dissatisfaction, and if the provision contained in the Army bill passed last summer, to place all officers in the Quartermaster Corps on one list, according to the date of their commission, shall work out satisfactorily, then I believe that a law should be passed so that we may place all of the officers in the various branches of the Army on one list. I am satisfied that a great deal of the dissatisfaction would be dissipated, and it would work to the advantage of the Army. The Navy has only one list, and a man can look forward with absolute certainty to his promotion from rank to rank. That is impossible in the Army to-day, and such a condition should not be allowed to prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know of anybody else on this side of the House who desires to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to use any more time?

Mr. HAY. I do not.

Mr. PRINCE. Then I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The agreement was that there should be three hours of general debate, which, of course, does not bind the committee to use the time. Many Members went away on the supposition that there would be three hours of general debate, and I will ask the gentleman whether in the bill he knows of any controverted items that Members who perhaps are not present might wish to be heard upon?

Mr. HAY. I do not. The only item I heard about was the one concerning which the inquiry was made by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. That is the only controverted item I know anything about. I do not know that there is any item in this bill that is opposed by any member of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking of the members of the committee. It is their business to be here.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] told me in the cloakroom that when those items were reached in the bill he desired to call the attention of the committee to some abuses that he thought ought to be corrected, and I judged from what he said that he would offer some amendment.

Mr. HAY. That item will not be reached for some time, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF.

Army War College: For expenses of the Army War College, being for the purchase of the necessary stationery, typewriters and exchange of same, office, toilet, and desk furniture, textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers and periodicals, printing and binding, maps, police utensils, employment of temporary, technical, or special services, and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, including $25 per month additional to regular compensation to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College Building, $9,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 8, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"That hereafter the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to detail from the Army or Navy of the United States one officer, who shall serve as his personal aide, and who while so serving shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel of the Army."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this is offered upon the request of the President of the United States, and I would ask the Clerk to read the communication which I have received from the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 13, 1913.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: I write to urge upon you the introduction into the military appropriation bill of a provision for a personal aide to the President, to be detailed by him from officers of either the Army or the Navy, and to hold during such detail the rank and to receive the pay of a colonel of Infantry.

I do this after four years' experience, which makes me feel that a personal aide is necessary to the President, and that he should have the rank and pay of a colonel. This is the rank of aides to governors.

It is the rank of the aide of a full general in the Army, and as the President is the Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, it would seem as if his aide ought to have equal rank and emolument.

I would not recommend it if my personal experience did not make me feel that such an aide is essential. It is true that the Engineer officer in charge of the public grounds and parks and, indeed, of the White House has the rank and pay of a colonel. In the old times it probably was given with the idea that he would serve as the personal aide of the President as well. But his duties are so many that, except at special social functions at the White House, it is impossible for him to be in attendance upon the President.

There is no law expressly authorizing a personal aide to the President, but my predecessors and I have exercised the power of the Commander in Chief to detail a captain or a major for the purpose. I think it would be better to have special authority on this subject, and, in the interest of my successor, to furnish him what I regard as needed assistance, I venture to send you this letter.

I have written a similar letter to Mr. MANN, leader of the opposition, with the hope that the provision may be treated in a nonpartisan spirit.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, has an amendment been offered to carry out the suggestion of the letter?

Mr. HAY. Yes; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] reserved a point of order.

Mr. SIMS. A point of order, then, is reserved?

Mr. PRINCE. It is reserved.

Mr. SIMS. If you decide to surrender it, I want an opportunity to make it.

Mr. HAY. I suggest that if you are going to make it that it be made now. There is no question that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SIMS. I understand from the letter that the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds does act as aide to the President, with rank of colonel.

Mr. HAY. It states just the opposite, namely, that the duties of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the city are such that it is not possible for him now to so act, and that heretofore the President and other Presidents have exercised their right as Commander in Chief of the Army to detail some person to act as their personal aide, generally a captain. The object of this amendment is to authorize the President to detail an officer of the Army or Navy, and while such officer is serving as personal aide he shall receive the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman what the duties of the military aide of the President are, as a fact?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Kansas knows them as well as I do.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman that all I ever see of him is at the presidential receptions. What are his duties outside of that?

Mr. HAY. His duties are greater than that. He travels with the President, he meets many people for the President, and he is constantly in attendance on him, and his duties, in my judgment, are very onerous.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the military aide, as a mater of fact, have daily duties?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly; yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. What are his duties at the White House?

Mr. HAY. He is there at the call of the President to perform any duty which the President chooses to impose upon him. He has to be there, as I understand it, all the time.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman this question: At present he does detail an officer of the rank of captain?

Mr. HAY. I think the present aide has the rank of major.

Mr. SIMS. And pay of major?

Mr. HAY. I think the present aide is a major in the Medical Corps.

Mr. SIMS. Is it the idea that a major, when serving as an aide, should have higher pay than when serving with his command?

Mr. HAY. That is the purpose of the amendment, namely, to give him the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel.

Mr. SIMS. Is the service so much more onerous than it would be when serving in his regular position that he should receive extra pay? Is that the ground on which this is based?

Mr. HAY. The President informed me that the expenses of a man in that position were very much increased by reason of the position, and he thought he ought to have this increase of pay.

Mr. SIMS. On account of the social functions he has to attend? I remember that Col. Bingham used to introduce visitors and people attending the White House receptions to the President.

Mr. HAY. It may be that the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds does that now. That is a very small part. You will remember that Maj. Butt, whom we all remember pleasantly and whose unfortunate end we lament, was the military aide of the President, and I happen to know that he was constantly on duty, and, occupying the position he did in relation to the President, he had a great many more expenses probably and had to live in a manner which he certainly would not otherwise have had to do.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], the chairman of this committee, personally think, as a matter of personal judgment, that this ought to be a law? Is the gentleman acting as a matter of courtesy or upon his own judgment?

Mr. HAY. I am acting upon the request and information and experience of the President, who thinks this ought to be done; and he places it also upon the further ground that if every governor has a personal aide with the rank of colonel, that if a general of the Army has a personal aide with the rank of colonel, the Chief Executive of the country ought at least to have an aide with the same rank as that of a governor of a State or a general of the Army. Now, personally I know nothing about it. The President states in his letter that he does not expect to receive any benefit from this himself, but that he is doing it in the interest of his successor.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the chairman of this committee, in whom I have great confidence, that I have never yet made a point of order on an amendment that he offered, and if he approves of this I will make no point of order against it, but will rely on the gentleman exclusively if he is confident that he is correct in this matter.

Mr. HAY. I am relying on the information I have received, and I think that information is entitled to still more consideration when it is remembered that the amendment will cost very little; and if it is any satisfaction to the President to have a man with the rank of colonel as his aide I think Congress ought not to withhold it.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. COVINGTON. The President is Commander in Chief of the Army, is he not?

Mr. HAY. Yes; he is.

Mr. COVINGTON. Does not the gentleman believe that if the President desires to have as his personal aide an officer with the rank of colonel he can find somewhere among the colonels in the Army a man who might be of such a personal character as to perform most efficiently and satisfactorily such service as may be required of him as aide to the President?

Mr. HAY. Yes; and if he did it he would have the pay and the emoluments and allowances of a colonel. If you restrict him to the selection of a man with the rank of colonel, he could not select the officer he desires from any other rank, but would have to select a colonel. I do not think it would be wise to select a colonel, who ought to be in command of his regiment, and it would be a pretty bad precedent to set to take a colonel away from his command and bring him here to the White House to be the personal aide of the President.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON], with the permission of the committee, whether it would not be satisfactory to provide that the person to be selected for this position should not be below the grade of major or lieutenant colonel?

Mr. COVINGTON. I do not see why you should discriminate against captains and lieutenants if you want to select an aide below the rank of colonel.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think there is a reason. I think the captains are of vastly more use and benefit with their companies, to be frank with the gentleman.

Mr. COVINGTON. Then the gentleman thinks that the colonel is of great use to the Army in the command of his regiment, and that the captain is of great use to the Army in command of his company, but that the major, coming in between the two, is of doubtful use to anybody?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the President ought to be restricted in the right to name any person he pleases in the Army to serve as his personal aide. I believe that under the Constitution he has the power, as Commander in Chief of the Army, to detail anybody he pleases for that purpose unless restricted by law. The only question here is whether you will give that man the rank and pay and allowances of a colonel.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit a question, I would like to ask if it is not a fact that at the present time these appointments at the White House, as they are commonly termed, are greatly sought by Army officers?

Mr. HAY. I think that is so; indeed, I know it is so.

Mr. COVINGTON. And that, even with only the pay of their rank, the peculiar attractiveness of service at the White House makes appointments as aides to the President peculiarly sought after by certain officers of the Army in grades as low as captain and lieutenant?

Mr. HAY. Yes; by certain officers of the Army. There are certain officers who are very anxious to receive such assignments.

Mr. COVINGTON. Under the present conditions, then, the President has no difficulty in procuring a suitable officer as his personal aide?

Mr. HAY. No; there is no difficulty. The only question here is whether or not the person selected is going to receive the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel.

Mr. PRINCE. The question has been presented rather suddenly, and for that reason I reserve a point of order so as to get my memory to work. I have been told, whether correctly or not, that Mr. Lincoln got along with a civilian; that Gen. Grant got along with a civilian; that President Cleveland got along with civilians. I do not like this idea of having an Army officer act as the personal aide to the President, who is elected by the people. It smacks, to my western way of thinking, a little too much of flunkeyism. It may be all right. The people may approve of it, but I do not like it myself.

Now, the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and if as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he wants to order them all to be around him in Washington, that is his right. But I am not going to be one, as a Member of this House, to consent by legislative enactment to an indorsement of that kind of work. For that reason I shall not only reserve a point of order, but will insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order insisted on?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingencies Military Information Section, General Staff Corps: For contingent expenses of the Military Information Section, General Staff Corps, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference, professional and technical periodicals and newspapers, and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad; and of the branch office of the Military Information Section at Manila, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $10,000: Provided, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation, $10,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what force the figures "$10,000" at the end of this paragraph have?

Mr. HAY. I was just going to move to amend by striking out those figures at the end of the proviso.

Mr. FOWLER. And put a period at the end of the word "appropriation"?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. HAY. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the figures "$10,000" at the end of the proviso, and in place of the comma after the word "appropriation" put a period.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will place the two amendments together. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 20, by striking out the figures "$10,000" at the end of the proviso, and in place of the comma after the word "appropriation" insert a period.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Military Information Section, General Staff Corps, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference, professional and technical periodicals and newspapers, drafting and messenger service, and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad, and of the branch office of the Military Information Section at Manila, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $10,000: Provided, That hereafter sections 3648 and 3682, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals, nor to official or clerical compensation to be paid for from this appropriation.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this is a duplication of the preceding paragraph, and was put in the bill by mistake, with the exception that section 3682 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to subscriptions, and so on.

The second paragraph is the form in which the department desire this language to be inserted; but upon examination of section 3682, which they do not wish to have apply to this appropriation, I am satisfied that it ought not to be in the bill, because out of this appropriation, if we repeal or suspend section 3682, they could pay both officers and clerks, and it never was intended that that should be done. Therefore I move to strike out that paragraph.

Mr. PRINCE. This is a duplication, is it not?

Mr. HAY. With the exception I have stated.

Mr. PRINCE. What is section 3682?

Mr. HAY. That section provides that contingencies shall not be used to pay officials or clerical employees.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; I remember that.

Mr. HAY. If this exception is put in there, they can take from this appropriation money to pay clerks and officers in addition to what they already receive. I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. PRINCE. You want to strike it all out?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is not very clear as to what the gentleman's amendment is.

Mr. HAY. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States service schools: To provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Staff College (including the Army School of the Line, Army Field Engineer School, and the Army Signal School) at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., the Mounted Service School at Fort Riley, Kans., and the School of Fire for Field Artillery at Fort Sill, Okla., by the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, the purchase of modern instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction, and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, to be allotted in such proportions as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be for the best interests of the military service, $30,350.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee what was the occasion for increasing this item $5,000 above that appropriated in the last session of Congress?

Mr. HAY. The increase was made because of increased expenditures at these various schools.

Mr. FOWLER. Was there any deficiency in the appropriation of the last session?

Mr. HAY. The appropriation last year was $30,000, so that the increase is only $350.

Mr. FOWLER. The appropriation last year was $25,000, was it not?

Mr. HAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but if he will look at the last Army bill, under the head of "United States service schools," he will find that the appropriation was $30,000.

Mr. FOWLER. If I made no mistake in making the comparison, it was $25,000. I may have made a mistake. The comparison was made by an assistant.

Mr. HAY. I have the law here.

Mr. FOWLER. I take the gentleman's word for it. He states that the $350 is the only increase.

Mr. HAY. The only increase is $350.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any deficit this year?

Mr. HAY. No; I think not. I am very sure there is not. The $350 was added for the purpose of meeting some additional expenditures at one of these schools.

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Contingencies, headquarters of military divisions and departments: For contingent expenses at the headquarters of the several military divisions and departments, including the Staff Corps serving thereat, being for the purchase of the necessary articles of office, toilet, and desk furniture, binding, maps, technical books of reference, professional and technical newspapers and periodicals, and police utensils, to be allotted by the Secretary of War, and to be expended in the discretion of the several military division and department commanders, $7,500.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the chairman to the words in line 2 of this paragraph:

The necessary articles of office.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this language is so general that there is no limit to the purchases which may be made under it.

Mr. KAHN. Necessary articles of office furniture.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No; it says:

The necessary articles of office.

I am only speaking as to this particular item, because provisions of this kind creep into appropriation bills, and it generally results in advantage being taken of them and expenditures being made that Congress has not contemplated. For the purpose of ascertaining whether or not any money has been expended under this item that perhaps Congress did not intend to authorize, I have made some inquiry to ascertain how this amount was expended in the last appropriation bill, or for the fiscal year ending June 30 last.

If I understand the law, official envelopes have to be purchased through the Postmaster General under contract. The different bureaus are not permitted to purchase penalty envelopes for the use of their offices except through the Postmaster General under authority of law.

In this particular instance I find that an account was submitted for envelopes and stationery. The item in the particular concrete case that I am referring to is a small one—only $58—and it was disallowed by the Treasury Department because it was not authorized by the language that I have referred to and because the law provides that official envelopes must be purchased under contract through the Postmaster General. The officer who incurred the expenditure stated that the envelopes and stationery were used for semiofficial correspondence and that it was desirable to have stationery that was a little more "classy"—that is the word used—than that furnished by the Government under the contract. The stationery was, it seems, in this instance embossed, $13 of the amount being for embossing the stationery that was used. The Treasury Department disallowed the item, as I have stated, because they thought it was not authorized by law and because of the statement that it was not to be used entirely for official purposes. The matter went to the Comptroller, and the Comptroller decided that under the language I have called attention to in line 2 the expenditure was authorized by that language.

I am only mentioning this particular case to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we put language in appropriation bills that enables expenditures to be made that are not contemplated by the appropriation.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota that the language of the paragraph seems to me to justify the decision made by the first officer of the Treasury Department who passed upon it, and that the comptroller ought to have sustained his subordinate officer, because it says clearly, "necessary articles of office, toilet, and desk furniture." Surely embossed stationery is not a necessary article of office in the War Department or elsewhere, and I do not think the language of the paragraph is of such a character as to authorize the comptroller to permit an expenditure of that kind. I do not see how you could confine the language any closer than it now is. "Necessary" is a word well understood as applied to an office. I do not know how we could make the language any stronger so as to prohibit what the gentleman has pointed out as an abuse, and I agree with him it is an abuse and ought not to be allowed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from South Dakota or the gentleman from Virginia whether they think it a terrible abuse to have embossed stationery, and whether both of them do not use it at the Government expense?

Mr. HAY. I say that embossed stationery for personal use is an abuse. Stationery that I have embossed is stationery which I use, and I suppose the gentleman from Illinois uses, in an official capacity.

Mr. MANN. All the stationery I get I use in an official capacity, in a private capacity, or any other capacity that I want to use stationery. I do not keep one bunch for official use and another bunch for other purposes. As a rule I do not use embossed stationery because I think there is no occasion for it. I notice, however, that nearly all Members of Congress do, and nearly all the heads of departments want it, and I think it ought to be abolished all through. But I wonder that gentlemen should criticize the department for buying $50 worth of embossed stationery when they use it themselves.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The law prohibits the purchase of envelopes except through the Postmaster General, and here are envelopes purchased out of the appropriation "Necessary expenses of office."

Mr. MANN. I am not seeking to review the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury. It is quite safe to say to the gentleman from South Dakota that the law does not require the purchase of any envelopes through the Postmaster General unless they are penalty envelopes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is contemplated that all the envelopes used by the department for the Government are being used for official business, and envelopes so used do bear the penalty stamp.

Mr. MANN. There are many envelopes used by the department for official business that are not penalty envelopes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Signal Service of the Army: For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, as follows: Purchase, equipment, and repair of field electric telegraphs, signal equipments and stores, binocular glasses, telescopes, heliostats, and other necessary instruments, including necessary meteorological instruments for use on target ranges; war balloons and airships, including their maintenance and repair; telephone apparatus (exclusive of exchange service) and maintenance of the same; electrical installations and maintenance at military posts; fire control and direction apparatus and material for field artillery; maintenance and repair of military telegraph lines and cables, including salaries of civilian employees, supplies, and general repairs, and other expenses connected with the duty of collecting and transmitting information for the Army by telegraph or otherwise, $375,000: Provided, however, That not more than $125,000 of said amount shall be used for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of airships and other aerial machines: Provided further, That from and after the passage and approval of this act the pay and allowances that are now or may be hereafter fixed by law for officers of the Regular Army shall be increased 50 per cent for such officers as are now or may be hereafter detailed by the Secretary of War on aviation duty: Provided, That this increase of pay and allowances shall be given to such officers only as are actual flyers of heavier-than-air-craft, and while so detailed, as provided in section 1: Provided further, that no more than 30 officers shall be detailed to the aviation service: Provided further, That paragraph 2 of section 26 of an act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," shall not limit the tour of detail to aviation duty of officers below the grade of lieutenant colonel: Provided further, That nothing in this provision shall be construed to increase the total number of officers now in the Regular Army.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that paragraph.

Mr. HAY. I will say that a part of it, providing for aviation officers, is subject to a point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to make an inquiry concerning the expenditure of $100,000 appropriated last year for aviation purposes. Has that amount been expended?

Mr. HAY. It either has been expended for the fiscal year or arrangements have been made to buy airships which will consume it all.

Mr. FOWLER. In the judgment of the military authorities, was that sufficient for making adequate preparations for airships?

Mr. HAY. It was not. The military authorities are asking a much larger appropriation than $125,000 carried in the bill. I mean that they are in favor of it; they did not estimate for it; but they are in favor of expending more money on these airships.

Mr. FOWLER. The amount, you say, was not estimated by them. The increase to $125,000 was the result of the deliberation of your committee?

Mr. HAY. I will say that heretofore in all bills that carried this item for some years it has been $125,000; that has been set aside for the purchase and repair of airships; but last year, owing to some difficulty on the floor, that was reduced to $100,000.

Mr. FOWLER. The bill for 1910 did not carry anything for aviation purposes, did it?

Mr. HAY. That is probably true; but I will say to the gentleman that the military authorities regard this airship proposition from a military standpoint as very important, and they regard the expenditure of $125,000 as a mere bagatelle and not furnishing them with sufficient airships. The reason why they have not asked or estimated for more money is that owing to the size of the Signal Corps of the Army they have not officers enough to man the airships if we provide more than we are providing under this appropriation. They are asking that we shall increase the Signal Corps of the Army by 55 officers, in order that they may have men enough to provide a fleet of airships to operate with the Army.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that the reason you offer the additional 50 per cent for aviators, because of the insufficiency of aviators?

Mr. HAY. No; there is no lack of aviators.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. They can get aviators; these officers are not detailed to aviation duty unless they volunteer. The service is a very hazardous one and four officers of the United States Army have been killed in this service.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I will.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the chairman if an officer loses his life in the discharge of his duty he is paid anything extra by the Government?

Mr. HAY. Not any more than if he was in any other service.

Mr. FOSTER. They get double pay, I understand.

Mr. HAY. No; they do not get double pay.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the bill of last year provided for that.

Mr. HAY. That bill did not pass the Senate. They serve at the same pay as officers in the Infantry, the Cavalry, or any other branch of the service.

Mr. COX. Do their heirs or their family get any more by reason of losing their life in the aviation service?

Mr. HAY. They do not; but there is a provision providing that an officer or enlisted man can designate a beneficiary who shall receive six months' pay.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call to the attention of the chairman of the committee the words in lines 12 and 13, as provided in section 1.

Mr. HAY. If no point of order is made, we will perfect that.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know why the 50 per cent increase is offered as a reward to aviators. Is that because you can not get volunteer aviators to take charge of these airships?

Mr. HAY. No; the 50 per cent increase that we are proposing to give to these aviation officers is given to them because of the hazardous duties which they have to perform, and because the insurance companies refuse to insure them. When they undertake this duty, they carry their lives practically in their hands every time they go up into the air in one of these ships, and it has been thought that they should receive extra compensation. The House at the last session passed a bill, by unanimous consent, giving them an increase of 100 per cent instead of 50 per cent, as is carried in this bill. From my observation and from what I know of this service and from what I have learned in the hearings before the committee, I am satisfied it is nothing but an act of justice that these men who are employed in perfecting military aviation should receive larger pay than men who do not run the same risk.

Mr. FOWLER. I agree with the gentleman, but why does not the bill fix an outright salary for this grade of Army men?

Mr. HAY. We do—50 per cent.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; but the gentleman says that the bill at the last session made it 100 per cent of the salary paid, and now it is only 50 per cent. What I am after in my interrogatory is, Why not fix a specific sum as a salary for these men, so that it may not be left to the caprice of the membership of the committee? I am using the word "caprice" with a great deal of reservation, not having any application to any committee whatever, but sometimes there is a caprice. Why not fix a sum so that it will be definite?

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that the paragraph does that very thing. It provides that hereafter the pay of these officers engaged in aviation duty shall be 50 per cent greater for such officers that are now or may hereafter be detailed to that duty. The officers detailed are generally second lieutenants and first lieutenants and captains, and you can not fix any certain amount for each individual; but by this language you simply add 50 per cent to their pay as a second or a first lieutenant or as a captain, as the case may be, and it would not be at the caprice of the committee every year to change it.

Mr. FOWLER. That is just what I was after. The gentleman's line of argument for the increase is because of the extra danger. You now limit this increase to those who are actual aviators. If that be the theory upon which the increase is to be based, why not give all of them the same salary, because undoubtedly every time one man goes up in the air his life is as much in danger as that of his superior in rank, so far as the salary is concerned.

Mr. HAY. That is very true, but I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is a principle of military discipline and of military law that the man of higher rank receives a higher pay than the man of lower rank.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not put all of the aviators as first lieutenants, then?

Mr. HAY. Because you might not be able to get a sufficient number of first lieutenants to volunteer for this service.

Mr. FOWLER. A provision could be made for that purpose.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes; it could be made. Of course we could confine the aviators to the rank of first lieutenant. That could be done, but the question is whether it would be wise.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the gentleman think that would be a wise provision?

Mr. HAY. I do not, because then you could not get a second lieutenant or a captain into this service.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; you could do that. Whenever a man qualifies himself for an aviator, let him at once become a first lieutenant.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But suppose he was a captain.

Mr. FOWLER. By virtue of law you could make an aviator a first lieutenant as soon as he was inducted into the aviator business. He would then become a first lieutenant.

Mr. HAY. Of course, that would apply to the second lieutenant, but a captain would have already passed the rank of first lieutenant and it would not apply to him.

Mr. FOWLER. I agree with the gentleman that the danger ought to receive some consideration, and I am heartily in favor of this provision; but I am seeking to put the danger of one man on the same plane as the danger of another man, whether the rank of office be the same or not.

Mr. HAY. I understand the gentleman's purpose, and I will point out to him that in a war when a regiment goes into battle and all of the officers of the regiment and the enlisted men of the regiment are exposed to equal danger from the fire of the enemy, yet the colonel gets a larger pay than the lieutenant colonel, and so on down. This is so in all armies, and in the aviation corps. The man of higher rank, for the sake of discipline and for the purpose of maintaining the relative rank, always receives a higher pay than the may of lower rank.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that full well; but you limit your increase to the man who is actually a flyer.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. FOWLER. A man who is a flyer ought not to be subordinated, in my opinion, so far as the question of danger is concerned. He ought to receive the same pay, although he might be a captain, as the man who is a second or a first lieutenant. I would be very glad to see the bill amended so that all aviators who are flyers might receive the salary of a first lieutenant, and that the increase might be made 50 per cent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As a matter of fact, there are some gentlemen now in the aviation service, capable officers, doing good work, helping to develop that branch of the military service, who are captains. It would certainly be no temptation to them to take on extra hazard in that vocation if it involved a reduction in pay.

The captain would not like to be reduced to the rank of second lieutenant and get 50 per cent in addition to the pay of first lieutenant, when under the terms of this act he would be entitled to increase of pay with the rank of captain. The most active men in the Aviation Corps of the Army are second lieutenants, who are usually young and generally of lighter weight, and thereby better suited for this particular branch of the service. This measure has been thought out and is entirely satisfactory to the officers of the corps, and is less expensive to the Government than would be the gentleman's idea of creating a military grade to be conferred on everybody in the Aviation Corps engaged in that work.

Mr. FOWLER. It would emphasize the position, and it ought to be so on account of the danger, and there ought to be an increase of salary, on account of the danger. There ought not to be any distinction in grade. Where a man can take an airship through the air for Army service he certainly ought to receive the same pay that any man does who performs the same dangerous work.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He does receive the same relative increase of pay, and they are entirely satisfied with it, and the bill is a more economical one than would be the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, and when it provides what is satisfactory and is more economical to the people, and does not disturb the relative military rank, and does not create new military rank, I can see no reason for adopting the idea which the gentleman proposes.

Mr. FOWLER. I submit it is not in harmony with the plan of a superior in everything in the Army. There seems to be an idea in the Army that a superior must always be at the head of every department in the Army. But here is one department where, if a man goes into the air as the manager of an airship, he becomes the sole owner of it for that purpose, like a great pilot on a great vessel on a large body of water, when the ship or vessel is in his hands. Here the airship is in the hands of the flyer, or the manager, or the captain.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, desire to interpose a point of order, but I am very anxious that all men who take like risks in the air shall receive like pay. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, in line 8, substitute for the word "fifty" the words "one hundred."

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I very much appreciate and approve the remarks of the very able chairman of this important committee, in so far as they pertain to the proper recognition of the aviation service of this country. I am very glad that not only the chairman but the entire Committee on Military Affairs have given this subject so much favorable consideration during the past two years. It was pointed out the other day in an objection to an amendment which I offered pertaining to establishing this service in the Post Office Department that the Army and the Navy were the proper places for the recognition of the aviation service. While I in part subscribe to that, yet I answer that objection by the statement, and it is a very fortunate fact, that our country at present is not engaged in warfare. I hope it never will be, but we are constantly giving evidence of the need and the practicability of carrying mails by aeroplane or other air craft.

This subject of aviation appealed to me when I first learned what was being done by the late Prof. Langley, and which afterwards was successfully carried out by the Wright Bros. From that day to this I have been very greatly interested in all that pertains to aviation, and, as some of my colleagues on this floor know, have taken occasion at different times to advocate governmental aid and recognition to this coming means, not only of national defense and attack, but of transportation in every phase of that subject. I introduced a bill, after giving it some attention, with the thought to better recognize the services of these men who fly through the air and who every time they do so literally and actually take their lives in their hands. I arose a minute ago to answer, for the information of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] a question as to what provision, if any, was made in the case of the sudden taking away of these bold experimenters. There is no provision whatever beyond that which applies in Army circles to give six months pay in case of the death of an Army officer. And yet it is a well-known fact, as pointed out by the chairman of this committee, that because of the very vocation of these men who sail the air there is no life insurance company that will write them for a dollar, because aviation is by all odds the most hazardous vocation or undertaking to which men can devote themselves.

I introduced the bill referred to, in company with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. We happened, by coincidence, neither of us knowing the intention or purpose of the other, to introduce bills about a year ago on the same day in the House, and they were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Those bills embrace similar features, but are not exactly the same.

My bill, I remember in particular, not only provided for a larger increase in the pay of these men, but also an increase in rank, and had in it a provision which I wish might be incorporated in this bill at this time, to give, instead of six months' pay in the case of the sudden taking away of these men while making actual flights, a whole year's pay. I think that would be fairer, more just, and equitable.

I am not, Mr. Chairman, going to enter into a lengthy discussion of this very important subject. I am very glad to say its importance is becoming more apparent before the House at every session. I want to say, while it was pointed out by my friend from Texas, Mr. SLAYDEN, that the Army officers were satisfied with this provision, that that statement ought to be qualified. They were satisfied, because at this time they thought it was the best proposition they could get; but from my talk with several of these gentlemen who have been engaged in this service for two or three years past, one of them having made more than 200 flights, every time taking his life in his hands, I am convinced that they believe they should have more of an increase than this bill provides. I must say to their praise and credit that there has not been a time in the last two years when these men could not have quit the service and received much better compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHARP. I was told by one of these officers, who is the leading aviator in our service under the Signal Corps, that he had been offered time and time again by the men who conduct exhibition flights several times the salary that he is now getting as an officer in the United States Army. There has not been any question but that some of these spectacular aviators can command and have commanded from $25,000 to $30,000 at a single season. But none of those men was willing for a single moment, at the inducement of any financial consideration, to leave the service of the flag that they had sworn to protect. They are in the service to-day, and they expect to live and die in that service.

In appealing to this House for an increase of recognition in their behalf, I am doing that which has already been granted to men in like service in European countries. Why, to draw a comparison between what we have done and what France, Germany, and England have done, not only in providing for their national defense, but also for the promotion of this entire field of aviation, would be like comparing the strength of a child with that of a giant. In popular subscriptions they have raised millions of dollars over there for the advancement of this science of aviation, and in continental Europe a man is considered a hero and almost a martyr, I might say, who enlists under this particular service, involving so much of danger.

I stated recently upon the floor here, that it is one of the most encouraging signs of recent legislation or proposed legislation that this House has now—thanks to the gentleman who is chairman and his colleagues of this committee, and also to the Committee on Naval Affairs—come to recognize the growing and urgent importance of this line of research. The President of the United States within the last two weeks has appointed a commission of most distinguished personnel, consisting of noted scientific men, who have given several years of thought to this particular line, in order that they may recommend the establishment, according to the best known plans, of an aerodynamic laboratory.

We all know how, nearly a quarter of a century ago, M. Eiffel, the distinguished Frenchman, astounded the world and won its admiration by the construction of a sky-piercing tower in Paris. It is standing there intact to-day and is still the highest of all monuments. It is this mechanician Eiffel in the ripening years of his old age—and he is a man now upward of 80 years of age and is still a devotee to the sciences—who has erected one of the most magnificent temples to this science of aviation by the building of a great aerodynamic laboratory.

These are the things which are the forerunners of what we must have here if we would intelligently master its problems. I think that not alone is my amendment of importance in giving to these men a better recognition for their services, but above all else the chief value of such an amendment is to serve notice upon those men who would enlist under the Signal Corps that Congress, the representative legislative body of the Government, is back of the work with its encouragement.

A question was asked a moment ago as to whether there was any difficulty in recruiting this service, whether there was any difficulty in getting a sufficient number of men willing to volunteer in this hazardous work. I want to say—and it is to the credit of the American youth and to those who want to distinguish themselves not only in the Army but also in scientific exploitation—that we always have a liberal supply of volunteers, away beyond the number that our present law will accommodate, owing to the restricted size of the Signal Corps. Until the provision was made in this or a former bill, I think only seven men were detailed to that particular service. I do not recall whether this bill now provides for 30 or 40. Which is correct, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. HAY. Thirty.

Mr. SHARP. The bill provides for 30. Gen. Allen, of the Signal Corps, who has given much time during the last few years to this splendid subject of aviation, has done more than any other one man in the Government to bring it to fruition. He is a man of unerring vision—one whose chief monument, if I mistake not, shall in the years to come be the evolution brought about by the successful navigation of the air as it affects alike the problems of warfare, transportation, and scientific research.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I earnestly hope that the committee will adopt the amendment. In doing so, if the committee sees fit to do it, we shall only be standing by our own record.

Last July this House, by a unanimous vote, passed a bill, which I had the honor to introduce, giving a 100 per cent increase. That bill was reported with the unanimous support of the Committee on Military Affairs on this floor, and it had the approval of the department. In the Senate some objection was raised——

Mr. MANN. I do not think it had the approval of the department.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I am right. The chairman will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that I understood the department to recommend a 50 per cent increase.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am in error, then, in that one particular. I know that every other detail of the bill had the approval of the department, and I thought they had agreed to the 100 per cent increase. However, this House, without a dissenting vote, put in a 100 per cent increase last July. There is no reason why we should modify our position.

Mr. MURDOCK. What was the objection in the Senate?

Mr. HAY. They objected to the size of the increase.

Mr. HARDWICK. They did not want 100 per cent increase. They wanted, I think, some increases to other branches of the Signal Corps. I am not familiar with all the details. They wanted to apply the same sort of increase to some other branches of the Signal Corps and they did not want to put this higher than the others. But, gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me this amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] is absolutely right, and that we ought to enact it.

To-day this country is behind, is woefully behind, every other civilized country on earth, every other great power on earth, in this great matter of aviation. While I join with my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] in congratulating the able chairman of this committee and the other members of the committee for the splendid progress that we are making, and upon the fact that we have apparently awakened at last to the necessity of doing something in this matter, the step we propose to-day is only a very short step in the right direction. Gentlemen, these officers can not even get life insurance. The percentage of mortality here and abroad is simply frightful among the men engaged in this work.

Mr. MONDELL. Can a soldier ordinarily get life insurance?

Mr. HARDWICK. This is the only branch of the service under the War Department in which the officers are unable to obtain life insurance, according to the testimony.

Mr. MONDELL. Then insurance companies do not consider ordinary warfare as particularly dangerous?

Mr. HARDWICK. They do not insure any of them in time of war, but these men can not get insurance even in time of peace.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that it is difficult.

Mr. HARDWICK. They can not get it at all, I think. All the best life insurance companies refuse it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what may be the practice of insurance companies now, as I am not particularly informed about it, but I know from my own personal experience that they do insure in time of war, or did during the Spanish War.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman means that life insurance companies insured officers?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The Spanish War was not regarded as very dangerous.

Mr. HARDWICK. If my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] wants real information, I will say to him that no matter what they do about other Army officers in time of war, they will not insure the officers in this aviation corps even in time of peace. The mortality among them is frightful. The rate of pay even at the 100 per cent increase proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP], and that this House unanimously adopted a few months ago, is not equal to what it is in any other great country on earth.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman state what the rate of mortality is—how many deaths have occurred in our service?

Mr. HARDWICK. The chairman of the committee can state.

Mr. HAY. Four officers, and I think about 12 in all have been detailed to this duty.

Mr. HARDWICK. That would be 33⅓ per cent. Anyhow, I know the mortality is perfectly frightful, and I do think that even with double pay these men are underpaid, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] has said; and as numbers of these officers have told me in person, and as they have stated before your committee, any one of them could make many times more just as a matter of speculation if he would go into commercial aviation.

Mr. SHARP. Double pay, as the language states, only applies while the officer is in actual duty.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is only when they are actually engaged in aviation for the Government. If they were engaged in aviation as a private enterprise, taking exactly the same chances, no more and no less, they would get many times more than they will even with an increase of 100 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. I earnestly urge that we adopt this amendment. If we can not get it through the Senate at 100 per cent, if we have to accept some compromise later, it will be time enough to do so then, but I do think we ought to make a stand here to-day for a 100 per cent increase, just as we did last July, and take the matter into conference at least.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the 100 per cent increase of pay last year. I did so under the impression that it was not excessive, and I do not know that it is excessive. I have been interested in this legislation, and in an humble way I have cooperated to bring it about. I have conferred with the authorities; I have conferred with a gentleman connected with the Signal Corps who is jealous of the honor and rights of that corps and who wants to do what he can to promote it reasonably. This measure came to us as the recommendation of the War Department. I have also conferred with gentlemen who have been detailed to duty as aviators. They have expressed themselves to me as being satisfied with the proposed legislation and have said they would be glad to see it enacted. Naturally they would be glad to get still more money if possible, but they are entirely content to have this legislation go through.

Mr. SHARP. I want to say that Capt. Paul Beck, who is one of the leading aviators, and I think outside of Capt. Chandler the leading aviator in our service, with whom I have had many conversations, and who has made 250 flights in different parts of the country, says they should have at least 100 per cent increase. He thought they ought to have an increase in rank; but when we came before this committee and had our hearings we became satisfied that that would create embarrassment, if not dissention, in changing the rank, so it was confined purely to a question of compensation. That is my understanding of it from the aviators themselves.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will permit, I think the position taken by these officers detailed as aviators is very disinterested and patriotic. They would not interfere with this legislation. They would rather have the legislation for the improvement of the service, even if they could get nothing in the way of increased pay. But the gentleman does not mean to leave them in the attitude of saying that a 50 per cent increase is perfectly satisfactory to them, I am sure.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have talked with some of them who told me that they would be glad to have this legislation, and that it would be satisfactory.

Mr. HARDWICK. Only 50 per cent?

Mr. SLAYDEN. On the 50 per cent proposition; yes. I do not know what caused them to reach that conclusion, whether they were afraid that they would have to go on serving, as they do now under detail to that duty, without additional pay. That would be looking behind their statements and trying to dig up the reasons that induced them to come to that conclusion. Naturally, as I said a moment ago, they would like more pay.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs have done the best they could under all the circumstances toward these aviators. We have recommended—

That from and after the passage and approval of this act the pay and allowances that are now or may be hereafter fixed by law for officers of the Regular Army shall be increased 50 per cent for such officers as are now or may be hereafter detailed by the Secretary of War on aviation duty: Provided, That this increase of pay and allowances shall be given to such officers only as are actual flyers of heavier-than-air craft, and while so detailed, as provided in section 1.

We worked this out as a workable proposition, although we may not have done all that ought to be done.

Mr. HARDWICK. Last July you worked it out on 100 per cent basis.

Mr. PRINCE. That is true, but that bill is not yet a law.

Mr. HARDWICK. But you have taken this bill and put it in the exact words of the other.

Mr. PRINCE. That may be, but we want to accomplish something. Those of us who have been here a number of years know that it is better to do something than to attempt to do something that you can not do. This is what we are trying to do, and that is to accomplish something for the material benefit of the men who are engaged in this hazardous enterprise under orders from superiors. The 100 per cent proposition has not passed the other body and has not been reported, as I understand, out of the committee. There may be plenty of time to do that, but it has not come yet. We are now as far as we can be in the future, and that is the present.

My friend from Ohio states that a distinguished aviator had made 250 flights and has met with no harm thus far.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. During that time he states that he has had three or four narrow escapes, as narrow as a man is ever permitted to have and still live. He has fallen from 50 to 100 feet in height and wrecked his machines.

Mr. PRINCE. We want to do what is best and to take a step in the right direction. If later on it should be established that 100 per cent is the proper thing, we can do it by subsequent legislation. But under all the circumstances, I think the Committee of the Whole should stand by the committee in the bill, because it has presented to this House the best bill it believes can become effective in the form of law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is it the gentleman's understanding that the increase of pay attaches to the service from the time the officer is detailed for aviation service, not necessarily that he shall become an actual flyer?

Mr. PRINCE. I rather think this language is clear.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It seems to say that when he is detailed, and then qualifies it. I should think it ought to apply to all of those who enter the service with the chance of being made flyers.

Mr. PRINCE. No; our purpose was as we have expressed it in the proviso:

Provided, That this increase of pay and allowances shall be given to such officers only as are actual flyers of heavier than air craft and while so detailed, as provided in section 1.

There may be two or three officers detailed who may be mechanical experts just watching the machines, never flying, in fact, but studying and preparing themselves. They are in no more danger by reason of that detail than though they had not been detailed. The hazardous part in the whole detail is in actual flying. We seek to pay for the hazardous part, and pay the men who are the actual flyers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the item in reference to the purchase of airships was inserted in the Army bill several years ago on my motion, after the War Department had refused to make an estimate for it and the committee had failed to make any provision in the bill. I have consistently supported all such provisions since that time and the increase of the amount that might be appropriated for aviation. I think I may be considered a friend of aviation.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman know when the War Department first made a recommendation for money to be set apart for aviation in the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that the first time it came in as an estimate was last year.

Mr. FOWLER. When was the first time that any amount was set apart for that purpose?

Mr. MANN. I think two years ago by the bill, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. FOWLER. I see in the law of June, 1910, no money was set apart for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I think that is correct. I think it was two years ago that the Signal Service asked for an estimate. The Secretary of War did not make an estimate, and hence it was not transmitted to Congress.

Now, I remember that when the bill passed at the last session it went through by unanimous consent, although I stated then that I thought 50 per cent was enough of an increase for the interests of the aviation service, which to me is the controlling feature.

If I had supposed this morning that the proposition was to be presented to the House to make this 100 per cent, I should have made a point of order on the paragraph. For this reason, while this proposition is supposed to be confined to actual flyers of airships, still we all know as a matter of fact that anyone can qualify under that in a few minutes time and without any danger at all. A man can become an actual flyer of a machine without getting more than 4 feet from the ground. All of them who are detailed will probably become actual flyers of machines. I take it that the purpose of the Government now is largely to educate officers who may be able to handle flying machines in time of need in addition to the experimentation with flying machines.

If you make it too much of an object for a man to remain in the aviation detail it will be very difficult to dislodge him from it. They go there practically by their own consent.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. KAHN. The Chief of the Signal Corps stated before the committee that men do withdraw from the aviation force after they have learned to fly.

Mr. MANN. They do now because they do not get any extra pay, but the purpose of this scheme is to educate men to handle the flying machines. In time of war we can increase the number of flying machines very rapidly. We want men who understand how to handle them.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and it applies to the illustration I may give. In the countries where aviation has made the most advancement and where they have come to the front rank, they have pursued a different policy from what the gentleman outlines. They give the aviators two or three times the amount of salary that they would otherwise give.

Mr. MANN. While that is true, Mr. Chairman, it is also true—and I have just received the figures from the Navy and War Departments to substantiate it—that we pay more for our small Army and Navy than any other nation in the world pays for their large ones. We pay for our Army, to our officers and enlisted men, many times the compensation that Germany pays to her immense army.

So it can not be said that they are not fairly well paid; but it is not desirable when an officer is detailed to this aviation service, not often flying a machine but still receiving the extra pay, to make it so large that he wants to stay there forever and become the envy of every other officer in the field. You can not give officers extra pay without the desire on the part of other men to get the extra pay, unless there really is extra-hazardous service. I have always supposed that one reason that the Army and Navy were fairly well paid and provided with pensions in case of injury, pensions to their widows in case of death, and retired pay in case of injury, was that the whole undertaking was hazardous. My understanding of the Army is that an Army officer takes the risk of being injured. That is what he goes into the service for. That is the whole theory of the Government's treatment of him. While I think it is perfectly proper to give some extra attention to these aviation officers, yet to double their pay is only to excite discontent among all the rest of the Army officers and to do more injury to the Army in the end than good.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. I ask the question purely for information and not to challenge the accuracy of the gentleman's statement. Has that been the experience in the Ordnance Department, where, recognizing the extra hazard of that department, the Government has uniformly increased the pay of the men in that service, as I understand it?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. How much is the increase, I will ask the gentleman?

Mr. SHARP. I do not know what it is.

Mr. MANN. I never heard of it before.

Mr. HAY. The Ordnance officers do not get any more than any other officer.

Mr. SHARP. Then I have been misinformed.

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, the House at the last session cut off, in part at least, the extra pay for foreign duty, because a good many officers were seeking foreign duty to get the extra pay, which was only 10 per cent. I thought it was worth that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHARP) there were—ayes 8, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "as provided in section 1."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment that, in line 7, on page 6, after the word "officers," there be added the words "and enlisted men."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, line 7, by inserting after the word "officers" the words "and enlisted men."

Mr. ANTHONY. Also the same amendment after the word "officers" in lines 8 and 11.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on those amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the reason that while enlisted men are not now engaged in the work of actual flying, there is no reason why they should not be so used, and the encouragement should be held out to the enlisted men of the Army if they are used in this work, and they should be given the same advance in pay.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of this provision is to give extra pay because of the extreme hazard. Officers of the Army now receive at the very lowest rate $125 a month, and that pay does not last very long. The enlisted man receives at the highest rate less than $50 a month, unless he has been in the service a long while and has become old. Upon what theory does the gentleman propose to say that you will add 50 per cent to the pay of officers for this service, thereby adding from seventy to one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars a month, and add only seven or eight dollars a month to the pay of the enlisted man for exactly the same service?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that there are unquestionably a number of noncommissioned officers who receive, as he says, from $50 to $60 a month. An increase of 50 per cent in their pay would be a very substantial increase.

Mr. MANN. But they are usually too old to go to work and operate flying machines.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; there are a number of young men, and I think every inducement should be held out to enlisted men to interest themselves in this service. I am not in harmony with the idea of the department that they should be excluded from it. If a young enlisted man is bright and capable and has a tendency toward this art, we ought to give him an opportunity.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would agree with the gentleman in this proposition: That the Army might well afford to employ the services of men for the special purpose of operating flying machines and pay them accordingly along the same grade. I should not be in favor of a proposition which will permit some Army officer getting 50 per cent more pay, amounting to a large sum of money, and having alongside of him an enlisted man who receives only $25 a month, and ordering the enlisted man to start a flying machine and run it while he watched it. That would be the result.

Mr. KENDALL. That would be voluntary service.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it would not.

Mr. KENDALL. The private is not compelled to go into the service.

Mr. HAY. I would say that enlisted men as well as officers volunteer for this service.

Mr. MANN. But that is not the law.

Mr. HAY. That is not the law, but that is a regulation of the department.

Mr. MANN. That is now, but at present the enlisted men are not permitted to operate these flying machines.

Mr. HAY. I know they are not permitted to do so now, but they would not be required to operate them unless they volunteered for that service, in my judgment. There is no more reason why they should be required to do it than an officer should be required to do it.

Mr. MANN. Well, this is a new service. It will not be a long time that men will be taken simply because they volunteer, any more than in any other branch of the service. Men who are thought to have satisfactory qualifications will be put in this service.

Mr. HAY. I think it ought to be so.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be so.

Mr. HAY. Particularly if there is an increase in pay. The gentleman's argument is the same as that of his colleague [Mr. FOWLER]—that all these men ought to be placed on the same basis. The gentleman knows very well that in time of war an enlisted man is as much exposed to danger as an officer; but he does not get the same pay as the officer, and the only way you can increase the pay of enlisted men or officers there is to increase it upon the basis of the pay they are receiving. That is the only way you can do it, and I agree with my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] that the enlisted man ought to be offered an inducement, as well as the officer.

Mr. BUTLER. Double his pay?

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to giving him a hundred per cent.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. What officers are permitted to volunteer for this service?

Mr. HAY. Any officer in the Army who is eligible.

Mr. KENDALL. Then, if the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is regarded favorably, why not give a private while on that detail the same pay as an officer?

Mr. HAY. Because you would destroy military discipline. Why not give to the private soldier in battle the same pay as an officer?

Mr. KENDALL. I think there is too much discrepancy there.

Mr. HAY. The officer has responsibility, has the command, and has to do the thinking. The officer is placed in a position where he is not only exposed to danger, but he has all the responsibility that attaches to the service which he is performing, whereas the enlisted man simply obeys orders.

Mr. KENDALL. Well, an officer up in a flying machine has no more responsibility than a private in a flying machine.

Mr. HAY. The probability is the private would go up with the officer in the flying machine.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is subject to a point of order. The proposition in the bill, of course, was subject to a point of order, and is subject, of course, to a germane amendment, and if this were a bill presented by itself I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] would be germane. But the rulings have been quite consistent in recent years that, although a proposition is subject to a point of order which is not made, that an amendment made to that, covering new matter, is itself subject to a point of order. At any rate, I make the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think this is subject to a point of order. It is a clause in this bill referring to the aviation service, and referring to men in the Army detailed to perform that duty. And the enlisted man is as capable of performing the duty as an officer. Surely it seems to me to be germane to the object and purpose of the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman will admit that the item in the bill only relates to detail of officers.

Mr. HAY. Yes; but while it is true it only relates to detail of officers, and would have been subject to the point of order—the whole paragraph, if anybody had made it—it not having been made it is not now subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. It would be akin to this: Suppose a proposition were offered to add after the words "Army" and "Navy," so as to make it read "officers of the Army and Navy who would receive increased pay," I think that would be subject to a point of order. Because it is a new proposition, an enlargement of the original one, that was subject to a point of order, and while any amendment relating to officers would be in order, I do not think you could introduce under the guise of an amendment a new subject, although this was itself subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, in a large sense this matter might be considered germane. It relates to a military matter. But it strikes the Chair, however, that under the paragraph relating to officers of the Regular Army who may be detailed on aviation duty, an amendment providing for men who may be detailed for like duty is new legislation, and is a detail perfecting the paragraph in a germane way. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 7, after the word "Army," insert the words "Navy and Marine Corps."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I reserve the point of order.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that when the bill was up in the last session of Congress, and the clause relating to the Army aviators was under discussion, a similar amendment was offered and accepted, placing the aviators of the Navy on the same footing with those in the Army. If we are going to consider the matter of permanent law for the aviators in the military service of the Government, it would seem, while this is the Army bill, perfectly proper that we should recognize that the Navy is engaged in aviation, and that the hazards are as great for the naval officers, if not greater, than for the Army officers, and that they should be put on an equality. That is the purpose I have in offering this amendment at the present time. In view of that, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will not withdraw his point of order, and let us make one bite of the cherry instead of bringing the matter up in the naval bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this being purely a bill for the support of the Army for the next fiscal year, it seems to me that it is hardly the proper thing to put on it certain things relating to the Navy, and I can not withdraw the point of order under the circumstances.

Mr. HAY. I understand the gentleman makes a point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 23 and 24. They were put in inadvertently.

Mr. MANN. Of course, there is no question but that a point of order would take them out?

Mr. HAY. No.

The CHAIRMAN The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, by striking out lines 23 and 24.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system: For defraying the cost of such extension and betterments of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system as may be approved by the Secretary of War, to be available until the close of the fiscal year 1915, from the receipts of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system that have been covered into the Treasury of the United States, the extent of such extensions and the cost thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of War, $50,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman if he has convenient or at hand the information concerning the receipts and expenditures of this cable.

Mr. HAY. Yes; I have. I can give the gentleman the cash receipts from 1907 down to the last fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. I mean only for the last fiscal year.

Mr. HAY. Yes. For the last fiscal year the receipts were $182,641.94. For the present fiscal year we have no figures as yet. They have not yet come in.

Mr. MANN. Are the receipts that the gentleman gives the gross receipts or the net receipts?

Mr. HAY. The gross receipts.

Mr. MANN. What was the cost of maintenance?

Mr. HAY. The cost of maintenance is difficult to ascertain, because it comes out of the item of $375,000 for the Signal Corps, which we have just passed. Gen. Allen, the Chief Signal Officer, states that the average commercial receipts from 1907 to 1912 were $198,000 and that they are not decreasing, but that in 1912 they were interrupted because of an earthquake, which destroyed part of the lines which were in use, and it took some two months to have them mended, and they lost the receipts that they were in the habit of receiving from that part of the line.

Mr. MANN. I am aware of the fact that this cable is a military necessity as yet. If we had information that would let us know whether it was maintained out of its commercial receipts it would be a matter of great interest.

Mr. HAY. It costs more than we receive from it. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANN. How much of it would be charged to military needs and how much of the maintenance is defrayed by the commercial receipts? I do not care about going into minute details.

Mr. HAY. I can not give the gentleman that information in figures, but I think the commercial receipts do not pay for this telegraph and cable system, and do not pay for it by a good deal. But the subject was pretty fully developed in the hearings of last year. If the gentleman desires, I will procure a copy for the gentleman and give him what the actual cost of it is.

Mr. MANN. What extensions are proposed? Are these land extensions or sea extensions?

Mr. HAY. As I understand, they do not propose this year any extension. This is altogether for the maintenance.

Mr. MANN. Betterments?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This item is not for maintenance.

Mr. HAY. They have to maintain it, of course.

Mr. MANN. I think the maintenance is not paid for out of this item.

Mr. HAY. No. The maintenance is paid for out of the other items.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of officers of the line, $7,710,800.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see this item is for the pay of officers in line.

Mr. HAY. Of the line.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; of the line. I discovered that in the bill of June last the appropriation was $6,890,908, and that in June, 1910, the amount was $7,000,000 even. What is the cause of the increase here of something near a million dollars over the appropriation of last year?

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that we did not appropriate money enough last year, and that is the cause of the increase.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there a deficiency in this item?

Mr. HAY. Yes; there is a deficiency in the item of pay of the Army which includes this item of $2,500,000.

Mr. KAHN. Two million eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HAY. Two million five hundred thousand dollars is what I understand.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that there is a deficiency of $2,800,000, but two years ago $7,000,000 paid this item.

Mr. HAY. No; it did not. There was a deficiency two years ago of over a million dollars.

Mr. FOWLER. In this item?

Mr. HAY. In the item of pay of the Army. The gentleman will find that there is a provision at the end of these pay items providing that they shall all be disbursed as one fund, and these items have been very carefully worked out.

Mr. FOWLER. There has been no increase in the number of officers this year?

Mr. HAY. No; there has been no increase in the number of officers this year, but last year there was an increase in the surgeons in accordance with the bill passed several years ago, which provided that every year so many should be added. I will say to the gentleman that the Chief of the Quartermaster Corps has worked out this item very carefully, based on the number of officers in the Army. He has worked that out with great care, and that is the conclusion he has arrived at. I know he is very accurate.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the increase in the item following because of a deficiency also? That is length of service pay.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the reason for the increase of both of these items?

Mr. HAY. Yes; and of every item in this pay part of the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear distinctly, so that I could catch the colloquy which took place between my colleague and the gentleman from Virginia with reference to the pay of the officers of the line. I notice that there are several items there where there are considerable increases over last year. Is there any increase in the number of officers or the number of enlisted men to cause this?

Mr. HAY. There is an increase in the number of enlisted men, but not in the number of officers—that is, it is proposed by the present administration, as I understand it, to increase the number of enlisted men during the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1913. I do not think there is any increase in the number of officers.

Mr. MANN. Is there a deficiency estimate on these items?

Mr. HAY. There has been no deficiency estimate sent to Congress, but the Chief of the Quartermaster Corps informed the Committee on Military Affairs that there would be a deficiency—I understood him to say of $2,500,000—in the pay department. It may be $2,800,000.

Mr. MANN. Then the appropriation which was made last year was not sufficient?

Mr. HAY. No; it was not enough.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember that there was considerable controversy in the House as to whether it would be enough.

Mr. HAY. I remember all about that, and I remember that the same controversy took place in the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, when I insisted that they would not have a sufficient amount, and it turned out that I was right, and there was a deficiency then.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly, and the gentleman with that experience ought to have provided against it last year. He ought to have gained wisdom by experience.

Mr. HAY. I do not deny that. We all live and learn.

Mr. MANN. There is no gentleman in the House who has more the confidence of the House than the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. [Applause.] Of course, we all know that the decrease in the appropriation last year was a part of the game of politics which I believe the gentleman from Virginia entered into with great reluctance, and I doubt whether he will ever repeat it.

Mr. HAY. I will assure the gentleman that so far as I am concerned there will be no deficiency in the Army appropriation bill hereafter if I can prevent it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay for length of service, $2,291,574.56: Provided, That hereafter no officer or enlisted man in active service, who shall be absent from duty on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs, or alcoholic liquors, or other misconduct, shall receive pay for the period of such absence from any part of the appropriation in this act for the pay of officers or enlisted men, the time so absent and the cause thereof to be ascertained under such procedure and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman, if he desires an explanation of that proviso——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is desirable to enact that into permanent law at this time?

Mr. HAY. The committee put that in the bill because it is not considered desirable to carry the proviso constantly in the bill each year, if it is advisable to make it permanent law.

Mr. MANN. I thought last year we had some sort of an understanding that we would try it and see how it worked before we made it permanent law.

Mr. HAY. The Surgeon General tells us it has operated very efficiently.

Mr. MANN. That may be, but it has been on trial only a very short time—a few months.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman objects, I will move to strike out the word "hereafter," in line 23, page 7.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 23, page 7, strike out the word "hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay for length of service, $83,000.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to strike out the last word. The quartermaster's department, the subsistence department, and the pay department were consolidated last year into the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. It was urged at that time that such a consolidation would result in a great saving, as I recollect, in the way of expenses.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I have studied this bill in the best light I have. I would be glad to have the chairman of the committee point out some of the savings which have been made.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that the savings that have been made have been made in the items of regular supplies, barracks and quarters, incidental expenses, subsistence of the Army, transportation, and so forth.

Now, the gentleman is evidently leading up to the question why it is that there are 407 quartermaster sergeants when only 200 were appropriated for last year. I will state to the gentleman that in last year's bill there were 207 commissary sergeants appropriated for, and these 207 commissary sergeants are now in the Quartermaster Corps. They, added to the 200 quartermaster sergeants appropriated for last year, make the 407, so that there is no increase at all on account of the consolidation. We have simply brought them under the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. FOWLER. And there is no decrease by this consolidation?

Mr. HAY. Not in this particular item.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any decrease in the service in this department or in the administration of the department?

Mr. HAY. Yes; the chief of the Quartermaster Corps stated in our hearings that the estimate for this bill, by reason of the consolidation, had been decreased in the department by $2,750,000. In that one item alone there was a decrease of 43 clerks, who are not, however, carried in this bill, but are carried in the legislative bill. Their pay amounted to over $50,000.

Mr. FOWLER. How much do you estimate has been saved by this consolidation?

Mr. HAY. On this bill?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. There has been a saving of $2,750,000.

Mr. FOWLER. How much by this one consolidation?

Mr. HAY. A saving of $2,750,000 on the estimates made by the War Department in this bill. Of course it does not save any pay except the 40 officers who will eventually be gotten rid of by that consolidation. The pay of the Army is one thing. The supplies of the Army are something else.

Mr. FOWLER. The distinguished chairman is certainly to be complimented because of his long vision in the make-up of the Army appropriation bill last year, and I congratulate him and his committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of 135 first-class sergeants, at $540 each, $72,900.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The number of men cared for by the bill last session was 132. What is the necessity for the increase?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the law authorizes the employment of 135 first-class sergeants.

Mr. FOWLER. Was that carried in the bill last session?

Mr. HAY. No; this session the department estimated for the three additional first-class sergeants. That is the information we had, and we thought that they ought to be given the three first-class sergeants.

Mr. FOWLER. You make an increase from 36 to 42 Signal Corps electricians in the paragraph just above. Is that because of the provisions of the law?

Mr. HAY. Yes; they are allowed that by law, and these estimates are on that basis.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not see the necessity of the increase and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. HAY. They said they had to have them.

Mr. FOWLER. And you took their word for it?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw my pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of 552 first-class private, at $18 per month each, $119,232.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what a first-class private is. What is the meaning of that term?

Mr. MURRAY. With the permission of the Chairman, I will answer the gentleman from Kansas. I do so because I happen to have been a first-class private in the Signal Corps and I may be qualified therefore to answer it. There are various grades in the Signal Corps, and it is entirely because of the convenience of rating for the purpose of payment to have the different grades, and also for the purpose of rating men in the particular grades of work that the difference is made between privates of one class and another and sergeants of one class and another. The Signal Corps, as the gentleman probably knows, has to do largely with technical kinds of work in the Army in connection with the matter of conducting a campaign either of warfare or of occupation. The Signal Corps is charged with the conduct and maintenance of the telephone communication as soon as a brigade or corps command has been established. The Signal Corps has the work of maintaining and carrying on telegraphic communication. The Signal Corps, since the development of aeroplanes and flights through the air, has had had that kind of work to do. Manifestly, it is important to have men of one grade of experience and mental equipment to do particular kinds of work as distinguished from men of another grade.

Mr. MURDOCK. How many grades of privates are there?

Mr. MURRAY. I think only two.

Mr. MURDOCK. How are they designated?

Mr. MURRAY. Privates of the first class and privates.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is a mere matter of gradation?

Mr. MURRAY. That is all.

Mr. FOWLER. And of pay.

Mr. MURRAY. It is for the purpose of compensation, also, just as in the navy yards we have first-class machinists and first-class wiremen. The separation is mainly for the kind of work to be done and largely for the purpose of the pay roll.

Mr. TILSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MURRAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. There is this further convenience, if I may suggest to the gentleman, that in the Signal Corps oftentimes they are split up into very small detachments.

Mr. MURRAY. Frequently.

Mr. TILSON. In the mobile army of the Infantry the smallest detachment is the squad with a corporal in command. In the Signal Corps it is often the case that they are sent out with only two men together, and in that case it is a convenience for one man to rank the other and have charge over the station. In that case the first-class private would have charge of it rather than the other private.

Mr. MURRAY. The suggestion of the gentleman from Connecticut is entirely sound.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay for length of service, $61,064.64.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would be glad to have the chairman explain the cause for the increase in this item, "Additional pay for length of service," on page 9.

Mr. HAY. Additional pay for length of service is fixed by law. The department knows how long each man has served, and in this instance it happens that men have served the requisite time which entitles them to additional pay to the extent of the increase in the item.

Mr. FOWLER. This is for privates.

Mr. HAY. Yes; every private is entitled to additional pay for length of service.

Mr. FOWLER. If he serves a certain length of time.

Mr. HAY. Automatically so much is added to the pay.

Mr. FOWLER. It was $50,000 last year.

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $55,180.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see in line 7 for additional pay to such officers there is an increase from $104,990 to $118,610. In line 11, for additional pay to such officers for length of service, $55,180. The appropriation heretofore, as I recollect, in August last was $61,620. I desire to ask the chairman why the increase is in one instance and a decrease in the other?

Mr. HAY. They are two different departments. One is the Corps of Engineers and the other the Ordnance. There is a much larger number of officers in the Corps of Engineers than in the Ordnance Department.

Mr. FOWLER. That says for pay for length of service. I see in the Corps of Engineers you appropriate for officers $460,300. That is the same as two years ago and also for last year. Now, when you come to the Ordnance Department your appropriation there for officers is exactly the same—$228,500. Now, for the additional pay of men it is only $55,180, whereas it was $61,620 last year?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman wants to know about the decrease?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. The reason is that officers may have died.

Mr. FOWLER. Can the gentleman tell which one it is?

Mr. HAY. No; that operates automatically. For example, an officer who has served five years in the Army gets an increase at the end of the five years of 10 per cent of the pay which he is receiving. At the end of 10 years he gets 20 per cent, and at the end of 15, 30 per cent; and at the end of 20 years he gets 40 per cent. That is fixed by law, and it is automatic and if in the Ordnance Corps it turns out this year there are not as many officers entitled to this length-of-service pay as there were last year, of course there would be a decrease in the item.

Mr. FOWLER. I presume the gentleman relied upon the report from the War Department for this estimate.

Mr. HAY. Yes; we relied, of course, upon the estimate. We had nothing else to go by.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $22,350.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to that paragraph.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to make the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to explain the matter to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. The reason I reserve the point of order is because I am inclined to think that it is subject to a point of order, but I do not desire to make the point of order now. I do desire to ask the chairman the reason for limiting the number by positive law to the number fixed in this paragraph.

Mr. HAY. The purpose of it is to decrease the expense. On May 18, 1911, the Quartermaster General of the Army, in hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill to create a general service corps in the Army, stated, concerning the first provision of the bill then before the committee, that if the rate of pay was increased from $150 a month to $175 a month all of the pay clerks could be replaced by enlisted men of the service corps, as some of the pay clerks receive as high as $2,000 a year. The change making the highest pay in the service corps $175 a month was made in section 4 of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913. It is not desired to displace any pay clerks now in the service, but as it is thought that sergeants of the first class and sergeants of the Quartermaster Corps can be trained to perform the duty efficiently, in the interest of economy it was recommended that a provision be inserted, after the lines in the Army appropriation bill providing for pay of pay clerks, that hereafter no vacancies shall be filled.

Mr. FOWLER. They are all placed on a salary now of $1,125 a year, are they not?

Mr. HAY. No; they get an increase by virtue of length of service; and after a service of some years, as I understand it, they get $2,000 a year.

Mr. FOWLER. Are these pay clerks looked upon favorably by the War Department?

Mr. HAY. I think they are considered a very excellent body of men; yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the gentleman to say, in answer to my first question, that the limitation was placed and the only reason given was that certain other men might do the same work in the department.

Mr. HAY. Yes; do the same work as the pay clerks.

Mr. FOWLER. Then, if they are looked upon favorably, why limit the number so that it can not be increased hereafter?

Mr. HAY. The number is limited now. Under the law they can only have 85 pay clerks. This provision provides that hereafter no further appointments shall be made.

Mr. FOWLER. Suppose all of the pay clerks that are now in the service as pay clerks should by some means be taken out of that department of the service, by death or otherwise, then what would you do if this paragraph be passed?

Mr. HAY. Of course if they were all to fall down and die at the same time, it would be very unfortunate, but that is hardly within the range of possibilities.

Mr. FOWLER. I concede that is true.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. These pay clerks were covered into this corps under the consolidation act that we passed, were they not?

Mr. HAY. The pay clerks were provided for before that time.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but they were covered into the Quartermaster Corps by the consolidation act that we passed.

Mr. HAY. They were.

Mr. MANN. And there was a proposition at one time to dispense with all civilians in that service, but they were kept in the service.

Mr. HAY. Yes; they were kept in the service.

Mr. MANN. And now as they disappear it is desired to have their places taken by enlisted men.

Mr. HAY. That is right, by sergeants in the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. MANN. Because it would be more economical?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And the same work could be done by other men for less money?

Mr. HAY. That is right.

Mr. FOWLER. Then they are not really looked upon so very favorably by the department?

Mr. HAY. I think they are a very excellent body of men.

Mr. FOWLER. The work is looked upon as favorable to be done, I know, but these pay clerks might be dispensed with and other men might do the work for less money.

Mr. HAY. That is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of 85 pay clerks, at $1,125 each per annum, $95,625: Provided, That hereafter no further appointments of pay clerks shall be made.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 22, after the word "department," insert the words "and acting dental surgeons and contract surgeons."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because acting dental surgeons and contract surgeons are not officers. And therefore if those words were not added they could not receive that pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of one superintendent Nurse Corps, at $1,800 per annum, $1,800: Provided, That hereafter the superintendent shall receive such allowances of quarters, subsistence, and medical care during illness as may be prescribed in regulations by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. There is just one superintendent, I take it. There has been a good deal of talk about the reorganization of the Nurse Corps, has there not?

Mr. HAY. A reorganization of what?

Mr. MANN. Of the Nurse Corps.

Mr. HAY. No; there has not. There is only one superintendent.

Mr. MANN. I have had a number of communications about it.

Mr. HAY. Some project of that sort has been spoken of, but we have never had anything submitted to us with regard to the reorganization that I know of.

Mr. MANN. What does the superintendent of the Nurse Corps now get? Are these allowances for quarters?

Mr. HAY. This item was carried in the bill last year giving these quarters, and so forth, and we put the word "hereafter" in so as not to make it permanent law.

Mr. MANN. What does this superintendent receive?

Mr. HAY. Eighteen hundred dollars.

Mr. MANN. And fogey pay?

Mr. HAY. No. The superintendent does not receive any fogey pay. It only provides for allowances and quarters, but the superintendent of the Nurse Corps does not receive fogey pay. She is not an officer, nor is she enlisted.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say how much the allowances for quarters and subsistence are to the superintendent? There is no statement in here of what the allowance for quarters will be.

Mr. HAY. As may be prescribed in regulations by the Secretary of War. It gives the Secretary of War——

Mr. MANN. I know; but what is the allowance now? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. HAY. I do not think she gets any now.

Mr. MANN. It is in the current law——

Mr. HAY. You mean last year. I do not know how much she got.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me as a rule it ought not to be left as permanent law to the discretion of the Secretary of War as to what allowances shall be.

Mr. HAY. I agree with the gentleman, except it is very difficult in a case of this sort, where a person has no status as an officer or enlisted man, to fix just what the quarters should be. It might be that the superintendent would have better quarters at some posts than others.

Mr. MANN. There is only the one superintendent?

Mr. HAY. Only one.

Mr. MANN. After it is ascertained what that superintendent receives, I think it would be just as easy to enact it into law as it would be to leave it to the War Department to be hereafter—I will not say harried, because that might occur with another superintendent——

Mr. HAY. I do not think there will ever be but one superintendent of the Nurse Corps.

Mr. MANN. In course of time the superintendent will pass away and another will come in.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know if there is any exception, where if it is left to the supervisory officer to fix the salary and amount of compensation, that officer is not in the end besieged by some occupant of the position?

Mr. HAY. I know that to be the practice, and I think we ought to have it determined in the law; but I will say to the gentleman that the matter was not called personally to my attention. Next year I will try to see if I can learn what her allowances are, and fix them in the law accordingly.

Mr. MANN. Then why not leave out the word "hereafter"?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "hereafter" on page 12, line 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of officers on the retired list and for officers who may be placed thereon during the current year, $2,877,000.

Mr. TILSON and Mr. CULLOP rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], a member of the committee.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 23, strike out "$2,877,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$2,874,500: Provided, That hereafter when any officer who has been retired for disability is found by an examining board, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, to be physically and mentally qualified for active service, the President may, in his discretion, reinstate such officer upon the active list as an extra officer, with the rank and relative position he would have held if he had not been retired: Provided further, That such officer shall continue as an extra officer only until such time as a vacancy shall occur in his grade and arm of the service, and if again retired for disability he shall be retired with the rank and pay received by him before his reinstatement."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make it or reserve it.

Mr. HAY. I make it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TILSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe this is subject to a point of order. It clearly would be except for the so-called Holman rule. It is very clear that the effect of this, if the amendment is enacted into law, would be to reduce the retired pay.

In this case I have made a reduction in the total equal to the retired pay of one captain, because I happen to have in mind a bill in regard to it—and it is on the calendar of this House with the unanimous report of this committee—one captain who under the terms of this law would be reinstated; and the total result of that reinstatement is the taking from the retired list this one retired officer. In other words, the total retired pay would be reduced by $2,508. I have subtracted this sum from the appropriation. There might be others; there probably would be others; there should be others.

Mr. Chairman, without going into the merits of the case, which I could not properly do under this point of order, it is very clear that the retired list has been abused. There are men on that list who ought to be doing active service; men who are as well as you and I; men who having served on the active list of the Army until they could be retired are now drawing three-quarters pay and are engaged in the civil activities of life. I believe these men should go back on the active list and do actual service; and if they do every one that can do so under the provisions of this amendment would reduce the retired list just to that extent.

As we all know, there are just so many officers provided for in the Army, and when that list is filled we add one more and he becomes an extra officer. In the course of every 10 days, we will say—we could take the average for several years past—about once in 10 days throughout the year there occurs a vacancy. As soon as the vacancy occurs this extra officer would slip into that vacancy, and thereafter there would be no extra officer, and after this officer ceased to be an extra officer there would be a saving of the amount of his retired pay.

In other words, he would be on the active list serving where he ought to be, and some other man, who otherwise would have filled this particular place, would not be there—that is, he would be out of the service, because there would not be any place for him in the service. Therefore clearly, Mr. Chairman, it is a reduction of retired pay if any man avails himself of this amendment. It seems to be beyond question a reduction, and it is in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see the amendment if the Chair has no immediate use for it. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that while there seems to be a reduction under this item, yet if you put this man on the active list he will be receiving a larger amount from the Government than he is receiving now.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentlemen?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Will he not fill the place of some man who otherwise would be on the active list?

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes. Are there any vacancies to-day in the rank of captain?

Mr. HAY. I do not know.

Mr. TILSON. They would fill them right up.

Mr. HAY. I do not know whether there are any vacancies in that rank or not.

Mr. TILSON. If there is such a vacancy it would be filled at once, would it not?

Mr. HAY. I do not know. I only know that the effect of this amendment would be to increase the amount in this bill, because if you take this amount that the gentleman speaks of from the item of retired officers, you must put it on to the pay of officers of the line, because you will have to provide for the pay of a captain on the active list.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. If you retire a man and another man is put in his place, what is the reason that you are not paying for two? You are paying the man who is put in the place of the man on the retired list, and you are paying the man on the retired list, too.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman's proposition is this, that hereafter when any officer is retired for disability and he should be found by an examining board, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, to be physically and mentally qualified for active service, the President may, in his discretion, reinstate such officer on the active list as an extra officer. Therefore, he would be an extra officer. I say, Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that he shall be placed on the active list as an extra officer, and if he is placed on the active list as an extra officer he could not take the place of some other man who is on the active list.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the chairman there?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will realize, if he will read the whole amendment, that that will last only until there is a vacancy.

Mr. HAY. We do not know how long it will be until there is a vacancy.

Mr. TILSON. If we take the average number of vacancies last year, or of two years ago, or as long back as the gentleman wishes to cover, we know that a vacancy in this rank does not exist certainly longer than a month.

Mr. HAY. Then for that length of time you would be increasing the appropriation, instead of decreasing it.

Mr. TILSON. That would be maximum, a month, and 10 days would be the average. During the rest of the year we would be decreasing it.

Mr. HAY. I might be willing, Mr. Chairman, to have this done in the case of a particular officer about whose condition I was satisfied and who I knew ought to be returned from the retired list to the active list. But to make this a general provision and a general law, and make it mandatory on the Secretary of War to receive these men into the active service, notwithstanding the fact that they are to be examined, seems to me to be bad legislation. There is no question about the fact, that instead of decreasing the appropriation it would increase it, and that being true, it does not come within the Holman rule.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. If this amendment as proposed should become law, would it not be possible for a man on the retired list with the rank of first lieutenant to get back into the Army with the rank of major?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. In other words, he would be getting promotion while on the retired list?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly; and he would be disarranging the promotion, probably, of all the officers in the arm of the service to which he would go back, and the possibilities contained in this amendment are such that, in my judgment, it would be very bad legislation to enact. And if it is subject to the point of order, as I believe it is, that it does not decrease expenditures, I can not consent to accept it.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. There is nothing on the face of it to show that it decreases expenditures.

Mr. HAY. It does not decrease them.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the effect of this amendment—and he would like the members of the Military Committee to correct him if he is in error—potentially everybody on the retired list could be restored to the active list. Once restored they would draw the increased pay that would attach as a result of that restoration. It is not contended however that such a wholesale restoration is likely, or probable.

The reduction made in the total is, I believe, the sum of $3,500.

Mr. TILSON. It is intended to be the pay of one captain for one year on the retired list, $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Having in mind the possible number of restorations that will reasonably follow upon the enactment of this amendment, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] that an officer who was retired in one rank, might be restored in an advanced rank carrying larger pay, it is perfectly clear, to the Chair at least, that it can not be reasonably ascertained that the operation of this amendment will reduce expenditures. The view taken by the Chair is that the crucial test of a proposition submitted under the Holman rule is whether it will effect a retrenchment. In this connection, I am referring to the legislative features of the amendment. The Chair before holding such a legislative proposition to be in order must be satisfied to a reasonable certainty, that in its working effect, it will reduce expenditures. I am not satisfied that a reduction of expenditures will attach to the operation of this amendment. Hence it is not within the rule, and the point of order must be sustained.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, one moment. The amendment itself carries a reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, but the Chair has ruled heretofore that a reduction can not be made a peg on which to hang any sort of legislation. If the legislation brings about the reduction, that is another situation; but the mere fact that a reduction is offered in an aggregate total, does not justify legislation which can not be reasonably regarded as the efficient cause of the reduction. The legislation must be the efficient inducing cause of the reduction.

Mr. TILSON. There is no use arguing with the court after he has made his decision, but it seems to me the Chair has stated only half the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly willing to have the other half stated.

Mr. MILLER. If I may have the privilege, although I am not a military man, and although the Chair has ruled, I desire to submit——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly willing to correct his ruling if he is in error. The Chair has no desire save to carry out the reasonable intent of the Holman rule.

Mr. MILLER. It seems to me that the logical conclusion which must be drawn from the remarks of the chairman of the committee is that the more you increase the retired list, the more you retrench expenditures, and the more you reduce the retired list, the more you increase expenditures. As a matter of fact an enlargement of the retired list, it seems to me, must necessitate an increase of expenditures, and a decrease of the retired list must of necessity reduce expenditures. They are supernumeraries. I do not say that in any disrespectful sense, either. They are no longer in active service. The active work of the Army must be performed, and the law provides the number of officers who must be kept to do that work.

Mr. TILSON. That is correct.

Mr. MILLER. It seems to me an absolutely necessary deduction that if you decrease the number on the retired list you must reduce expenditures.

Mr. HAY. But if you replace them, you replace them at increased pay, and they do not take the places of other active officers.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. They go back as extra numbers.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman answer one question? Can the gentleman figure out how many officers under this amendment could conceivably be restored to full pay?

Mr. MILLER. I could not; but suppose there are 2,000 officers in the active service of the United States Army. That is the number authorized by law, and it is kept as nearly full as possible. There is always a shortage. Suppose there are 1,000 men on the retired list. If we reduce that number by 50, we leave 950 on the retired list and put 50 back, who will form a part of the 2,000.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. No; they are extra numbers.

Mr. MILLER. It may be that they would not for a moment become a part of the 2,000. Perhaps each man would stay 10 days. Suppose he stayed 20 days or 3 months. After he had passed the time in which he would get increased pay he would spend the rest of the time in taking the place of some one of the 2,000 active officers.

The CHAIRMAN. In the meantime the extra compensation might amount to a geat deal more than the reduction of $2,500. That is what the Chair is seeking to point out. You can not possibly figure out that the reduction of $2,500 is a necessary consequence of this amendment. The arguments pro and con are too nearly balanced, the facts are too uncertain to furnish the ground for a satisfactory conclusion of retrenchment.

Mr. MANN. Will the Chair permit me a moment on the point of order?

Mr. HAY. I thought the Chair had ruled on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Under the Holman rule there are four phases of adding legislation to an appropriation bill. The last one, which, of course, is not applicable to this amendment, is that it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of a committee, and so forth, which amendment being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

Under that provision of the Holman rule, as I understand the decisions, it is necessary for the Chair to be able to see on the face of the amendment, or with such information as he is furnished, that the amendment will reduce expenditures.

There is the other provision in the Holman rule—

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

It is admitted that the amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, I do not admit that at all.

Mr. MANN. I assume that it is because it is perfectly patent on its face. The amendment is germane to the bill. Now, the amendment does reduce the amount of money covered by the bill carrying legislation with that which it is claimed will further reduce the expenditures of the Government. But I do not understand from the decisions heretofore made that it is the duty of the Chair to determine whether the additional legislation will reduce expenditures or not when it is coupled with the proposition which does in fact reduce the amount carried by the bill.

It is for the House, then, to determine whether, in their opinion, there will be a reduction of expenditures which would entitle the House to favor the amendment. It is impossible in any event, except where you cut off officers or cut off salaries, or dispense with the service through officers or salary, to say that anything will reduce expenditures. These two points are carried by the first two provisions of this rule—"shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers or by reduction of the compensation of any person." There is practically no other way of reducing expenditures except by decreasing the purchase of supplies.

Here is an amendment which does, in fact, reduce the amount of money carried by the bill, but it is claimed that the reason for making that reduction is that the legislation proposed will accomplish the reduction. I do not see how there is any escape from the proposition that the amendment making a reduction in the amount carried by the bill and carrying legislation with it for the purpose of making the retrenchment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman puts his contention on the ground that this will reduce the number of officers?

Mr. MANN. My contention is that it reduces the amount carried in the bill, with a germane amendment which it is contended accounts for that reduction; in fact, I think it reduces the total number of officers, but that may be speculation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the chairman of the committee whether, in his judgment, the effect will be to reduce the number of officers?

Mr. HAY. No, Mr. Chairman; the effect of it will be to increase the number of officers, and admittedly so; that is, to increase the number of officers on the active list, where they receive a larger compensation than they do on the retired list.

Mr. TILSON. It is perfectly clear on the face of the amendment that there would be no additional officer, because you take one off the retired list and put him on the active list. The net result is there is no more than you started with.

The CHAIRMAN. But is there a reduction?

Mr. TILSON. After the first vacancy occurs there is a reduction of one. The chairman of the committee is not satisfied that there will be a vacancy soon. I know that during the year 1912, which was a normal year, there were three such vacancies every month, so there would be a reduction at the end of the first vacancy which might occur in a week, and it might possibly be a month.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman inform the House how many officers under his amendment would be carried from the retired list to the active list?

Mr. TILSON. No one knows.

Mr. HAY. That is the point I make—nobody can tell.

Mr. TILSON. Every one that occurred would be so much reduction.

Mr. HAY. Not at all; they might all be extra officers. There might be 40 officers added to the Army by virtue of this amendment.

Mr. TILSON. They could not last as extra officers.

Mr. HAY. They might be there six months or a year.

Mr. TILSON. There would still be a reduction.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this question, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] are both wrong as to increase and decrease of officers. There is no increase of official positions and no decrease of active officers, but you do take officers from the retired list, and in so removing them reduce the amount carried in the bill—that is to say, keep them in the active list of officers.

The CHAIRMAN. According to the rule there must be a reduction or a decrease of officers.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, this question was discussed before the Naval Committee, and the same statement made before the Naval Committee is now made by the chairman of this committee. I sought information from the Secretary of the Navy, and here is his statement, which I hold in my hand; 12 retired men, retired by the plucking board, were placed on the retired list, at a salary of $44,700 in the total. Now, their successors, who filled their places, received $65,065. I mean, the successors of these men who have gone to the retired list. All along down the line they have created 33 vacancies—commanders and lieutenant commanders. They amounted approximately to $128,000. Now these are the successors of those retired. After they are promoted it increases their salary to $157,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an increase from $128,000 to $157,000 in one year, and what would it amount to in 100 years, 12 being retired or plucked each year? Those retired are receiving $44,000 after they go on the retired list. If you keep them on the active list, there is no retired $44,000 to pay and no increase in pay of the 33 promotions to fill vacancies. When you take one man from the active list you create a vacancy that goes all the way down the line, and you promote the men all the way from one end of the line to the other. If you refuse to move the men to the retired list, then, sir, you do not create any retired list, and you keep them there, and there is no vacancy to fill, and consequently no $44,000 retired pay. This is not a difficult proposition. It seems to me any one can see this enormous increase as applied to any retirement. I think the proposition before the House is the same.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not see that what the gentleman says about the Navy would apply to this question here. We have not in the Army what they call a plucking board. We have no institution of that kind in the Army; and, moreover, the fact is the gentleman is mistaken in his view that the object of this amendment is to put somebody on the retired list. It is to put somebody from the retired list onto the active list.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. First, in relation to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the amount covered in this bill is reduced, it may be said that the suggestion is well taken. The aggregate total is reduced by the amount of $2,500. Having this reduction in mind it is argued that germane legislation sufficient to account for that reduction, is in order. The Chair admits that this argument is sound, and holds that germane legislation effecting the reduction is in order. But unrelated legislation can not be attached to the reduction, for an amendment reducing a total does not require the authority of the Holman rule, and hence can not be made the basis of legislation which is not the necesary and efficient cause of the reduction. Using the reduction in the total as a peg, you can not hang all sorts of unrelated legislation on that reduction. The reduction must be accounted for by the legislation, and the point that the Chair undertakes to present in this connection is that, after listening to the contention of the participants in his debate, and looking to the amendment, he is unable to perceive that in its necessary operation it will effect the reduction of $2,500, or any portion thereof. If it does not effect this reduction, then it is not in order. If it does account for it, the Chair will hold that the amendment is in order. From the arguments submitted, the Chair understands that the possible effect of this amendment will be to restore an indefinite number of officers to their old pay, or possibly to greater pay, since their grade may be advanced. They may, or may not render the promotions of other officers unnecessary or reduce the number required. For a time at least they might receive this increased pay without rendering service. It is difficult to see that in its operation as a whole this amendment will reduce expenditures. In fact its economic operation is altogether problematical. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Medical Department: For pay of officers in the Medical Department, $1,600,000.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman what is the total amount carried in the bill.

Mr. HAY. $93,833,177.

Mr. HELM. Has the chairman made any estimate, or is he in a position to tell the committee, what portion of that sum, including length of service pay, is paid to officers of the Army, the staff, line, commissioned, noncommissioned, and retired officers?

Mr. HAY. I can state to the gentleman that the pay of the Army is about one-half of the amount of the bill.

Mr. HELM. One-half of the $93,000,000 goes to the officers of the Army?

Mr. HAY. The officers and men of the Army.

Mr. HELM. Does that mean the enlisted soldiers?

Mr. HAY. Yes. I say that about one-half of the amount carried in the bill goes to the pay of the Army.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand the chairman to mean the pay of the Army includes the pay for all classes and grades and enlisted men?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is not the gentleman mistaken when he says that one-half of the $93,000,000 goes to the officers of the Army and to the enlisted men?

Mr. HAY. Of course that includes the officers on the retired list and the enlisted men on the retired list.

Mr. HELM. What I am trying to get at is this: Is it not a fact that one-half of the $93,000,000 goes to the officers of the Army of all classes—staff, line, commissioned, and noncommissioned, and their increased pay, and so forth, and length of service pay, and so forth. Does not that include one-half of the $93,000,000, exclusive of the pay of the enlisted men?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. HELM. I believe if the gentleman will investigate it closely he will find that about $40,000,000 of this sum of money that is carried by this bill goes to the officers, exclusive of the enlisted men.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is mistaken. If the gentleman will add up the pay items, including the $16,000,000 for enlisted men, he will find that the pay is about $47,000,000, and that includes the entire pay of the Army.

Mr. HELM. I am not in a position to take issue with the gentleman directly on this bill, but if this bill corresponds approximately with the bill of last year, I believe that I am in a position to state, and I believe that I will be sustained by the fact, that one-half of this $93,000,000 goes to the officers of the Army, exclusive of the enlisted men.

Mr. HAY. I can only say to the gentleman that he can very easily verify it by adding up the pay items, but I can assure him that he is mistaken.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Virginia will yield, I will call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the items in this bill on page 7.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Does this bill, in its appropriations for the pay of the officers of the Army, differ materially from the bill of last year in amount or in the number of officers?

Mr. KAHN. Not in the appropriation features.

Mr. HELM. In the amount for the pay of men and officers?

Mr. KAHN. It is a little larger than last year.

Mr. HELM. But the underlying principle is the same?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. On page 7, as I was informing the gentleman, the pay of officers of the line is $7,710,800, appropriated in this bill. The additional pay of officers for length of service is $1,742,916.73. The pay of enlisted men is $16,973,474, and the additional pay for length of service of enlisted men is $2,291,574.56. In that one item alone the pay allowed to enlisted men is more than double the amount of the same character of pay allowed to the officers.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman refers to the pay of officers of the line on page 7. From page 7 of the bill to line 5 on page 13 of the bill, are not all of the items that have just been read, inclusive, for the pay of officers of some grade in the Army?

Mr. KAHN. Not of officers, but principally of enlisted men.

Mr. HAY. One item alone of $750,000 is for 20 per cent foreign pay. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that more of the items appropriated for pay of the Army is for enlisted men than for the officers. There can not be any question about that.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman this question, if he is prepared to give the figures on it.

Mr. HELM. Pardon me a moment. Do I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to say that the enlisted men receive more of the entire appropriation in this bill than the officers?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HELM. Officers of all grades—officers of the line, staff, commissioned, and noncommissioned?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a moment? The very last statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] brings a new consideration into the argument. The gentleman used the term "commissioned and noncommissioned." Of course, if the gentleman from Kentucky is adding the noncommissioned officers—sergeants and corporals—to the commissioned officers and is segregating everybody from the buck private in the rear rank, he is probably correct.

Mr. HELM. That is just what I meant at the outset of the statement——

Mr. MONDELL. The sergeants and corporals are just as much enlisted men as the buck private who has no sort of rank, and the item——

Mr. HELM. I understand that when a man is in the Army he is in the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. The point I am trying to make to the committee is this: That we have got a top-heavy arrangement; that when we come to speak of the Army, our officers, to use an expression of the street, seem to me to be "hogging the patch"; that if we are going to appropriate $90,000,000 that we should be getting better results for the amount of money that you are expending. And I do not think that I miss the mark very far when I say that I doubt extremely whether there is an officer in the United States Army to-day that could stand behind a line of battle such as is drawn in the Bulgarian-Turkish War and command that line of battle.

Now, what strikes me as being out of balance in this Army of ours is that instead of getting some results in the way of effective tactical organization with this expenditure of ninety millions, the entire contest here on the floor, when the Army appropriation bill comes up, is for some class or grade of officers to get some promotion and increase in their pay or some additional emolument; some amendment that gives some other particular class of the Army officers so much per month or per year more than they are now receiving; they are getting so much for quarters; they are getting so much for light and heat, so much for salary, and every imaginable thing, and they all want more. It occurs to me that this whole thing has grown up in a contest between the different grades or divisions of the officers of the Army as to who will get the most money out of this Army appropriation bill, instead of service and efficiency, and not how good a machine for war purposes can be obtained.

Now, I know it is an unpopular thing for a Member to stand on the floor here and criticize the officers of the Army. I have had them take very serious exceptions to positions I have had to take as the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. They are quite tender. You have to sort of tiptoe around. They are very touchy. They are very jealous of the position and the rank that they occupy. But it occurs to me the time has come when we ought to do some pruning, to cut off some of these good things that you are handing out annually to these officers.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I certainly will.

Mr. MONDELL. Did the gentleman vote for the bill before the House the other day proposing to give rank and increase of pay to horse doctors as officers?

Mr. HELM. Unfortunately, I was not on the floor. This is the first information I have had that that bill was up for consideration; but I will say, since you have brought it to my mind, that you have more horse doctors for the amount of horses that you have in the Army than you have any use for. I come from a section of the country where they have a good many horses and very good ones, too. Now, if I understand, you have one regiment of Cavalry in the Philippine Islands. Is not that a fact? I would like to ask some one.

Mr. HAY. We have two regiments of Cavalry there.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that you have four regiments of Infantry and one regiment of Cavalry?

Mr. HAY. Two regiments of Cavalry and four regiments of Infantry.

Mr. HELM. How many veterinary surgeons have you?

Mr. HAY. Four.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that you have nine?

Mr. HAY. Each regiment of Cavalry is entitled to two veterinarians.

Mr. HELM. I believe, if the gentleman will examine it closely, he will find that we have nine veterinary surgeons in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. HAY. If they have them, they are not with the command.

Mr. HELM. Where else are they?

Mr. HAY. The quartermaster may have them out there. They have veterinarians in the Field Artillery, but there is no Field Artillery there, I think.

Mr. HELM. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] has again expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I would like two minutes more.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. How many horses is a veterinary surgeon supposed to be able to look after and care for?

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that a full regiment of Cavalry, such as they have in the Philippine Islands, has in it somewhere about 1,300 or 1,400 horses, and therefore there would be, say, 650 horses to be cared for by a veterinarian.

Mr. HELM. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SISSON. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. Can the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] tell the proportion of men and officers in the Army? About what is the proportion?

Mr. HAY. As I understand it, there are about 80,000 enlisted men now, and about 4,000 officers; something like that.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman tell the committee about what is the total amount carried in this bill to pay retired officers, and then to cover appropriations for additional pay on account of length of service, and so on? Has the gentleman any calculation showing the total amount that is paid for that?

Mr. HAY. I may say that it is $2,877,600.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman got it anywhere in the act—the sum total?

Mr. HAY. The number of officers, does the gentleman mean?

Mr. COX. The amount appropriated in this bill for the officers, and the amount that is appropriated in this bill for extra length of service.

Mr. HAY. The amount appropriated for retired officers——

Mr. COX. I could find out if I looked into it, if the chairman please, but what is the sum total?

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that it is about one-half. I have not segregated those items from the other items.

Mr. COX. That is what I wanted to ask, whether that had been added up.

Mr. HAY. It has been added up by the clerk of the committee, and in examining the result of his computation I was struck by the fact that about one-half of the amount went to the pay of the Army.

Mr. COX. Then it would take about six or seven million dollars, would it not, to pay the retired officers for their pay and——

Mr. HAY. No; it would not.

Mr. COX. I am not through with my question. It would take something like six or seven million dollars, would it not, to pay the officers who have been retired, and then to pay officers for length of service and to pay enlisted men extra pay for length of service? It will approximate about six or seven million dollars, will it not?

Mr. HAY. It is about $5,400,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to the statemnet of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] that there is not a single provision carried in this bill that adds any emoluments to any officers beyond what they are already receiving on account of existing law. The pay of the Army is fixed by law, and the appropriation bill is made up of items taken from the law.

I want to say, too, to the gentleman in regard to his statement to the effect that the officers of the Army of the United States could not stand behind a battle line and command the army as is now being done in Bulgaria, that there has never been a time in the history of this Government when the officers of the United States Army have not been equal to every task which has been committed to their care. [Applause.] They are equal now to do their duty in battle and measure up to the officers of any army under the shining sun, I do not care where they may be. [Applause.]

I am proud of the records which the officers of the Army of the United States have made through all our history, and I am sure my friend from Kentucky hardly measured his words when he stated what he did about the ability of the officers of the Army of this country. In every branch of the Army, in every duty, whether that of the Army proper or the civilian duties, such as this great task of building the Panama Canal, the Army officers have always been called upon in emergencies of that character [applause], and they have always measured up to the occasion. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there ought to be no difference of opinion in regard to the views just expressed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] as to the gallantry and efficiency of the officers of the Army of the United States. We have, in my opinion, the best military schools in the world, and we have certainly the best material in the world from which to draw the young men who attend those schools for the purpose of preparing themselves to become officers of the Army and of the Navy. And we have the best plan in the world under which we select the young men who are to become the officers of the Army and of the Navy. We are the only Nation in the world that gives all of the young men of the country who are ambitious to serve their country an opportunity to secure an appointment and a military education, and there never has been a time, in my opinion, when the Army, both the men and officers, was as thoroughly fit and prepared for any emergency as it is this day. There has never been a time when we had as good an organization, when the men and officers were kept so thoroughly up to a concert pitch of preparedness, physically and mentally, as they are to-day.

And yet I sympathize somewhat with the views expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM]. He makes a mistake, in my opinion, when he attempts to segregate the enlisted men and to assume that the noncommissioned men among the enlisted men are officers. They are in no sense, as the term is ordinarily used in the Army, officers. They are enlisted men holding a higher rank than their fellows by reason of their ability and their service.

But it is true, in my opinion, that we have been much given in this country of late years to yielding to the importuning of the Army, to the social influence of the Army, in increasing the Army pay and the Army emoluments, and in no way have we erred more, in my opinion, than in giving rank and title and other peculiar military recognition to men who are not performing, or who are not called upon to perform, purely military duty. We are wiping out the line between the fighting men and the auxiliaries of the fighting force. In my opinion that is not a wise thing to do. And we have increased the pay and allowances, pay active and fogy, allowances and commutation, and all that sort of thing—well, at least as much as they should have been increased.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And it is only very recently that we have realized the gap between the rewards of the officers and the rewards of the enlisted men, and have sought more nearly to equalize the pay.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. I was just going to ask my colleague if we have not made very liberal provision for the pay of enlisted men?

Mr. MONDELL. We have made much more liberal provision than we did formerly, and in my opinion the enlisted men of the Army are at this time very well paid, and the service is one that should and does command the attention of some of the best young men of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HELM. I do not want to consume the time of the committee, but in response to the statement of my very much esteemed friend from Wyoming I want to add this observation in support of the statement I have made. He says that we have fine schools for the education of the officers of the Army. Well, a fine law school does not necessarily make a fine lawyer, and a fine medical school does not necessarily make a fine doctor. I doubt very much whether your fine schools come up to the standard which you have stated they do. I presume you refer to the War College, do you not?

Mr. MONDELL. I refer, primarily, to the Military and Naval Academies.

Mr. HELM. We are speaking now of the Army. We are not talking about the Navy.

Mr. MONDELL. The various service schools carry on the work.

Mr. HELM. If it is true that we have such exceptionally fine schools for the training of these officers, why have they not effected a tactical divisional organization? Nearly all the members of the Military Affairs Committee are here, and I want to ask you, Have you to-day a tactical divisional organization? Please, some of you, answer me.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that that is wholly a matter for the Executive, and not for the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. HELM. You concede that you have not such an organization, do you not?

Mr. HAY. If we have not the proper tactical arrangements, it is the fault of the War Department, and not the fault of Congress.

Mr. HELM. Ah, there you are. Now when you get up here and boast of what you have, it sounds all right. It reads well. We like to hear it. It falls good on our ears; but when you come to put the test to it you have not got it. Now, what is the work that your good schools are doing? Let me ask you this question: Can we go to war with anything less than a division? Can this country go to war with anything less than a division? We are speaking now of a fighting machine. Now answer me that question, please.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows that the War Department at the present time is working out a system of tactical units.

Mr. HELM. They have been doing that ever since I have been in Congress.

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. HELM. Just about this time of the year. I leave it to your candor. About the time the Army appropriation bill comes up you see it stated here and there that there is a group of Army officers somewhere incubating something that will look like a system if it ever hatches, but it never borns. It dies aborning. Now, you will not hear anything more of this thing for 12 months more. I understand quite a number of distinguished officers of the Army have been here in the city for the purpose of working out a plan, and the newspapers state that it has been accomplished and that the report is ready to be submitted. But where is that report?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I will.

Mr. KAHN. About a year ago the War Department for the first time undertook to organize the Army along——

Mr. HELM. I have yielded to the gentleman for a question, not a statement.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman asked me a question, and I am trying to give him the answer.

Mr. HELM. The simple question I asked was if you have a division tactical organization, which question can be answered yes or no.

Mr. KAHN. No; but one was started less than a year ago, and is nearly perfected.

Mr. HELM. Is it nearly perfected?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. It is out of the incubator. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. Have you any information as to when we will receive it? Will it be about the time the next Army appropriation bill comes up?

Mr. KAHN. I will say, for the information of the gentleman, that the matter has been worked on all through the period since the adjournment of the last session.

Mr. HELM. For how many years?

Mr. KAHN. Less than one year.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman make that statement advisedly?

Mr. KAHN. I do.

Mr. HELM. That they have been working on this particular proposition for one year?

Mr. KAHN. Less than one year.

Mr. HELM. What other propositions have they had similar to this, and how long?

Mr. KAHN. The question of reorganization along lines of tactical or divisional units was not taken up by the Army until about last April or May.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HELM. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes longer.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes the debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I think the proposition that I laid down in the outset has been fairly well sustained, by reason of the failure of the members of the Military Affairs Committee to show that you have what they claim to have. I want to ask my good friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] when was there ever a division of the Army assembled since the Civil War; and how can you get up on the floor here and say—and how can my good friend, the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], get up on the floor here and say that you have the officers to do the work that is being done in the Balkan-Turkish War, when, in the first place, you have not a divisional organization, and, in the second place, there has not been such a thing since the Civil War?

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman complain because the Army is not large enough?

Mr. HELM. I say the Army is too large. I am not complaining about the Army not being large enough.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman complain that we have not a large enough Army, or that we have not our present Army so concentrated as to have a division in one locality that can be easily gathered together and concentrated quickly? Is that the gentleman's complaint?

Mr. HELM. I am not complaining that the Army is too small. I am complaining that you have nothing that resembles a divisional organization within the Army. I will say that a well-organized army of 25,000 men is better than an unorganized army of 75,000 men.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. Was there before the Civil War an Army of the United States large enough to gather together a division? Of course, the gentleman must say there was not, because we did not have as many men in the Army as we have now.

Mr. HELM. As I was born since the war, of course I can not answer.

Mr. HAY. The officers of that Army who served on the northern side and the southern side displayed an amount of genius that has never been displayed by any other set of officers in any other country in any other age.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, that sounds good again. That appeals to you, that stirs your blood and starts you going; it makes you feel good. [Laughter.] You like to hear your Army bragged about as my good friend likes to hear his children bragged about.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the gentleman arguing that the standing Army should be increased?

Mr. HELM. No, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman know how many men compose a divisional unit? He is speaking of nine or eighteen thousand men.

Mr. HELM. I do not know how to run a railroad train, but I can sit in the passenger coach and tell when the track is in good shape and whether the men in charge of the train know how to run the train.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is talking about something that he knows very little about.

Mr. HELM. As I said, I do not know anything about operating a railroad, but I can tell something about the roadbed as soon as I take passage, and I can tell by the way the trains are handled whether the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad is as good a railroad proposition as the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. MANN. Is the Chesapeake & Ohio a good proposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. It is not as well organized or systematized as the Pennsylvania Railroad, and yet I do not know a thing in the world about railroads, either as to construction or operation.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Is there any division in the Chesapeake & Ohio?

Mr. HELM. Oh, there are plenty of them—divisional organizations.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. How much does the gentleman think that the Army ought to be increased?

Mr. HELM. I would say just as small as you could possibly get it, and as soon as we can get rid of the Philippine Islands I would say reduce it to 25,000 men. These islands are the only excuse you men have for a big army and big navy. The moment you get rid of the Philippine Islands your big navy and your big army is gone. You recognize it, and the War Department and the Navy Department recognize it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of the enlisted men of the Army on the retired list, $2,400,935.20.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hoped that I could entirely concur in the latest speech of my friend from Kentucky, but unfortunately he has fallen into a common error. In discussing what it may be are the faults of our military organizations, he insists that we should have a smaller military organization, and yet we should have one large enough so that we may have divisional units; and I assume that he would have this small Army so located that it would be divided up into a considerable number of very large units. His wish is a good deal like that of the little boy who hoped it would rain just hard enough so that he did not have to go to school and not so hard but that he could go fishing. He wants the Army so small that it will not be efficient and yet big enough to divide into large units. You can not do those two things. I am one of the people who believe that it is not so tremendously important that we shall have worked out every problem that the very latest craze of military development in Europe may have suggested as being important. Our history, the history of all the world, is that it is not necessary to have a great army, and that it is not necessary to have an army concentrated, and it is not necessary for men to have had in time of peace a great number of men to operate in order to develop military genius in order to be able to handle great military problems.

At the beginning of the Civil War, as the gentleman from Virginia stated a moment ago, we had men who had never commanded more than a fragment of a regiment; men who had had no experience with large numbers of troops, who immediately developed the ability to handle corps, divisions, and armies. I dare say that the men who have been handling the armies of the allied troops in the Balkans are men who never had experience with large commands.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is very brief.

Mr. HELM. How long between the time that the war was declared between the Balkans and the Turks until the allied troops drove the Turks back to Constantinople; how many days elapsed?

Mr. MONDELL. I was engaged in my duties here, and was not giving all my attention to that fact.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman has made statements about not being prepared; does the gentleman want to know how long it was?

Mr. MONDELL. It was only a few days until they had advanced, and they were prepared to advance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman believe the result could have been accomplished unless the men in charge of the Balkan troops and their allies had made preparations and knew what to do and how to command these troops and drive the Turks back in 18 days?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly no man ever accomplished anything if he did not know how to do it; but many men have accomplished great things once that they never had the opportunity to practice before, and a great many men have won great battles and have proven themselves great strategists and soldiers who have never commanded great armies; and while the gentleman belongs to that class of people who want an army so small that it would be entirely insufficient, practically valueless in the present condition of the country, at the same time he is arguing for the very things in organization that men argue for who want a very large army. We have grown way beyond an army of 25,000 men. We have grown to an Army of the present size beyond all question, whether we have the Philippines or no, and being one of those who do not believe in ever sending soldiers to the Panama Canal, except, perhaps, a corporal's guard possibly, I still believe we need all the soldiers we now have without regard to the Panama Canal, because we have not too many men to form the nucleus that will be necessary for expansion if we have foreign trouble. But it is not necessary to concentrate these men in great bodies. To do it is un-American. It is not necessary to have worked out to the last gnat's heel of detail some peculiar scheme of organization. It is necessary to get the right kind of material, men and officers, give them the proper instruction in the schools and in the fields, select them carefully for command as they discover their ability, and with the population to draw from that we have, the schools of instruction that we furnish, the field operations we now have, no one can doubt but that when called upon the Army of the United States will respond, men and officers, as nobly to the duties they are called upon to perform as ever did a soldier in the history of the world. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For commutation of quarters to commissioned officers, dental surgeons, veterinarians, and pay clerks on duty without troops at stations where there are no public quarters, $500,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 22, insert the word "acting" after the word "dental."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, because otherwise these acting dental surgeons could not receive the commutation of quarters.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Are there not dental surgeons also?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but they are commissioned officers.

Mr. MANN. They will be included under the term "commissioned officers"?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two, and then I may offer an amendment. I would like to know how many officers under this provision which has just been read receive commutation here in Washington?

Mr. HAY. I could not state to the gentleman how many officers are now in the city, but I can state to him that all of those who are stationed here who are not at the military posts get commutation of quarters.

Mr. WEBB. That commutation of quarters includes room rent?

Mr. HAY. And fuel and light.

Mr. WEBB. Can the gentleman tell me how many Army officers are transferred from Fort Myer to Washington on detailed duty who receive this commutation?

Mr. HAY. I do not think there are any detailed from Fort Myer. Those stationed at Fort Myer do not get commutation of quarters.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the object of this question was to bring out the fact that there has grown up in this commutation allowance an abuse which I think will be apparent. Under the present law, as I understand it, a captain, if he is detailed away from his barracks, or his Government quarters, gets five rooms at the rate of $12 a month for each room. That is $60 a month for room rent. A lieutenant gets three rooms, or $36. A colonel gets seven rooms, or $84, and a brigadier general gets eight rooms, at $12, or $96 a month. That was all that the Government originally intended to pay these officers as commutation, as I understand it, but according to the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury on January 31, 1907, it seems to me apparent that that ruling engrafted on to what Congress intended to allow them for commutation an additional allowance for heat and light. It is my understanding that there are 175 of these officers in this city who are drawing this unusual and splendid commutation of $12 a month a room, and heat and light pay also.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand the number to be 192, I will state to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. Then the number is larger than I thought it was.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the gentleman that a captain may have a wife and family.

Mr. WEBB. I will get to that.

Mr. HAY. And therefore four rooms would not be too great an amount, and he could not rent for himself and family proper quarters in this city for $48 a month.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, while that may be so now and then, I am informed that there are many captains and colonels and the rest of them who get this entire commutation and do not use but one or two of the rooms, or one-half of the rooms, and receive not only the entire commutation for room rent, but heat and light allowance also, although practically every room in this city is furnished heat free with the rent. Where an officer gets his room rent for $12 a month, say, a colonel who gets $96 per month for room rent, in addition to that he also gets $30 a month for heat and light. I say that is a species of—well, I shall not call it graft, but Congress never intended to allow that, and it ought not to be allowed by this House. Something like $50,000 to $60,000 are paid out in this city every year as commutation for heat and light alone, or about $5,000 per month.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. How many rooms is a brigadier general allowed commutation of quarters, heat, and light for?

Mr. WEBB. Eight rooms—I really believe nine now.

Mr. HELM. Suppose he is a bachelor?

Mr. WEBB. I have heard of a case where a colonel had seven rooms and occupied only two, but he drew his entire seven-room rent, and heat and light besides, and I learn that this practice is general.

Mr. HELM. Of course, the theory of the law was that in allowing a man five or six or seven rooms it was to house his family; but suppose he is an officer without a family; is he still entitled to this $12 a room a month?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; that is as certain and regular as his salary.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand that a brigadier general gets $96 per month?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I believe it is now $108 for nine rooms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman seems to have investigated this subject, and I would like to ask him if I am under a wrong impression. I have been informed that the gas and electric light companies of this city do not present bills for electricity and gas to officers of the Army who are resident in Washington. Does the gentleman know whether that is true or not?

Mr. WEBB. I could not answer that, but I have heard that such is the case, though I can not vouch for its accuracy. I communicated with The Adjutant General's office this afternoon and asked what was the commutation allowance for a captain.

Mr. MURDOCK. An officer has commutation for gas and electricity?

Mr. HAY. He has a certain allowance for heat and light.

Mr. WEBB. It averages for a captain about $19 a month for four rooms, whether he uses one room or four. The total allowance for his room rent by the year is $576, and $228 additional for heat and light, or a total of $804 for four rooms, heat, and light per year.

Mr. COX. Who furnished the figures to the gentleman?

Mr. WEBB. The Adjutant General's office.

Mr. COX. It is authoritative, then?

Mr. WEBB. I suppose it is. Now, take a colonel, and he gets $84 a month for room rent, $30 a month for heat and light—a total of $1,368 a year for room rent, heat, and light.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, does this colonel have some horses furnished him, and some provender, and a caretaker for the horses, and blacksmith service, and a stable in which to keep his horse, and heat and light for his horse?

Mr. WEBB. I have not investigated that yet, Mr. Chairman. I understand a colonel has a chance to buy a good horse which costs the Government $75 or $100 when it is young, and when it——

Mr. HELM. As a matter of fact, does he not get two instead of one?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I think they all have plenty of horses and vehicles, and things like that, and a veterinary surgeon to doctor them, and maintenance.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman regard $110 a month as excessive to furnish a colonel of the United States Army with a home, and light and heat for the same?

Mr. WEBB. That depends very largely. In some instances it might not be too much and in others it might be a great deal too much.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I am asking the gentleman to state it from the standpoint of the argument he is making in reference to these officers he has under observation.

Mr. WEBB. A colonel ought not to be allowed to draw room rent for eight rooms at $12 each, and light and heat allowances, $30, for that number of rooms and live in only two of them.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. If the Army officer is allowed so much money per annum to furnish him a home, has not he a right to choose whether he shall live in two comfortable rooms or six uncomfortable rooms?

Mr. WEBB. No; I think he ought to be paid what he necessarily and economically spends for room rent and heat and light.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Congress having provided that the officer shall have that as a part of his compensation, is the officer to blame for taking it?

Mr. WEBB. I will reply to that by saying that Congress has never authorized, so far as I can find, giving these officers heat and light commutation in addition to the room rental. The Comptroller of the Treasury made that ruling and grafted it on to the congressional act.

Mr. MANN. We passed a law to that effect. Congress has specifically provided for the number of rooms, and also provided for the heat and light by law.

Mr. WEBB. Now, tell me what a captain gets for heat and light by law? I do not think it has ever been specifically authorized by law when the officer is away from Government quarters.

Mr. MANN. I can not tell the gentleman now. I know that we had it up when we had the Public Health Service under consideration, which was asking the same thing. We did not give it to them in the law passed at the last session. The gentleman was probably in favor of the bill that did give them that. We did not provide that in the public health bill, and I wanted to correct that matter at that time. Congress had provided by law compensation for rooms and for heat and light to the Army officers who did not have it furnished in kind.

Mr. HAY. And that is only to those who are not stationed at the Army posts.

Mr. MANN. Not furnished in kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has again expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] wish to occupy the time in his own right?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I intended to do so and to yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the gentleman can use time in his own right, and then the Chair will ask if the gentleman from North Carolina desires more time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will take the time in my own right as a member of the committee. I think the gentleman is in error when he says there is no law for heat, fuel, and light to officers who are occupying houses not at military posts, where they have quarters.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will permit me, I said I thought the law originated by interpretation of the Comptroller of the Treasury. That is the first time we had it grafted on the law—heat and light allowance—as payable to these officers. It was built up by construction and interpretation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not remember exactly the time the law was passed that did give them fuel and lights. I remember I was opposed to it. But it is a law, and it made a very material increase in the allowance to officers not stationed at military posts.

Now, there is no objection that I can see to an officer taking the allowances that are provided by Congress. If they are excessive, cut them down; but no just criticism can be leveled at a colonel or a man of any other rank for taking the compensation that is provided for him by law.

Mr. WEBB rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] desire to submit a request?

Mr. WEBB. I would like to have five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a provision in the statutes. I agree with him in what he is contending for. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the statute authorizing payment for fuel and light. It provides:

> That hereafter the heating and lighting actually necessary for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and enlisted men shall be furnished at the expense of the United States under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Now, under that language it is held that they could not pay for fuel and light that was not actually furnished.

Mr. WEBB. What is the date of that act?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. March 2, 1907. Now, as I understand it, what the gentleman is contending for is that they are being allowed for fuel and light a certain amount, although it has not been expended?

Mr. WEBB. Exactly; and that law, I think, applies to officers in Government quarters, and was not intended to be given them when detailed away from such quarters, but only an allowance for room rent.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In other words, an officer who gets $96 a month is allowed in cash $36.

Mr. WEBB. Thirty-four dollars.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is under a regulation of the War Department, and the Auditor for the War Department held that that could not be done. But the Comptroller of the Treasury held otherwise and reversed the Auditor for the War Department, since which time they have been paying in cash to each one of these officers this amount. I think it averages about $25 a month, if I am not mistaken; and to the officers located in the city of Washington it would be between fifty and sixty thousand dollars a year. It is based on the number of rooms.

Mr. WEBB. It was never intended, Mr. Chairman, that this allowance for heat and light should be grafted on the law as it has been. Let us give them enough room rent and stop heat and light allowance. It was no doubt understood that the room rent should include heat and light. It is ridiculous to provide that a colonel should have $480 a year for heat and light alone. Usually heat and light are furnished with a rented room, or at least the room is heated. I do not censure officers for taking this allowance, for it is lawful for them to do so, but I am contending that we should change this ruling or law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is it not the experience of the gentleman, when it comes to renting quarters in the city of Washington, that they will take all you have got? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. There is something in that, I will agree, especially if you are a Member of Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it to the desk. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after "$500,000," in line 24, page 13, the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in payment for heat and light to commissioned officers, dental surgeons, veterinarians, and pay clerks drawing commutation of quarters."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to be frank with the gentleman. No part of this amount is paid for fuel and light, anyway. This is the pay for commutation of quarters. The money that is paid for heat and light is paid out of an appropriation for regular supplies. If the gentleman wants to offer an amendment, he ought to wait until we get to the item where the appropriation is made.

Mr. WEBB. I understood that this commutation was paid out of this particular appropriation of $500,000.

Mr. HAY. No; fuel and light are not paid out of this. This is commutation of quarters.

Mr. WEBB. Does not commutation of quarters come under that head?

Mr. HAY. That is for the pay of room rent.

Mr. WEBB. Where does it come in?

Mr. HAY. Under supplies in the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, in regard to that, may I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is any part of this money paid for heat and light?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then the amendment should be offered to some other part of the bill.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that the item to which he refers is carried on page 21, line 22:

For furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and enlisted men, for contract surgeons and contract dental surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts.

Mr. WEBB. Then I shall offer my amendment after the word "school," on page 22, line 2, and withdraw it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on soldiers' deposits, $90,000.

For pay of translator and librarian of the military information section, General Staff Corps, $1,800.

For pay of expert accountant for the Inspector General's Department, $2,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. Is there any provision in the bill as presented for paying back soldiers' deposits?

Mr. HAY. That has been carried in the bill heretofore for paying back soldiers' deposits, but we were told it was not necessary to do it; that the appropriation that was made was not enough to pay them back, and therefore it was not necessary to have that appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Heretofore you carried the item, and now you say it is not necessary to carry it?

Mr. HAY. It is not necessary to carry the item.

Mr. MANN. But, of course, it is necessary to pay them back.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a question for information. On page 14, line 6, is the item "For pay of expert accountant for the Inspector General's Department, $2,500." Do they employ accountants outside or some person connected with the department or the Army to do this work? If it is done by men in the department, do they pay them extra compensation for it?

Mr. HAY. No. This is one particular man, who is the expert accountant of the Inspector General's Department.

Mr. CULLOP. Is he connected with the department?

Mr. HAY. He is connected with the Inspector General's Department. He is the only expert accountant connected with that department.

Mr. CULLOP. It is not an outside man, then, employed for the purpose?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no. This has been in the bill for a good long time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mileage to officers, dental surgeons, veterinarians, contract surgeons, pay clerks, and expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, when authorized by law, $550,000.

Mr. HAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 20, after the word "surgeons," insert the words "acting dental surgeons."

Mr. MANN. All the gentleman needs to do is to insert the word "acting," as the words "dental surgeons" are already in the bill.

Mr. HAY. Yes; that will do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HAY. I withdraw my amendment and move to amend by inserting the word "acting" before the word "dental," in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 20, insert, before the word "dental," the word "acting."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 14, by striking out lines 20, 21, 22, and 23 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"For mileage to officers, dental surgeons, veterinarians, contract surgeons, pay clerks, and expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, when authorized by law, $392,855: Provided, That hereafter all officers of the Army when traveling under orders shall be paid their actual traveling expenses and no more."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HAY. So do I.

Mr. COX. In order to make the amendment conform to the section as already amended by the committee, I believe my amendment should contain the word "acting" before the word "dental."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not change the wording of the paragraph. He simply changes the amount and adds a proviso.

Mr. COX. That is all. Is the gentleman from Illinois going to make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I think I will in the end. I think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. COX. I do not think the amendment which I have submitted is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAY. Suppose we have that disposed of first.

Mr. COX. Yes; it had just as well be disposed of now as afterwards.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that precisely the same question arises here on the point of order that arose on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], in his amendment, offered to reduce the amount, with a provision that officers shall be paid their actual expenses. I know of no way by which anybody can determine whether the actual expenses of officers will be greater than the amount allowed now by law. It is a mere matter of argument to say that they will, and I understood the Chair awhile ago to make the ruling that the reduction of the amount was not of itself sufficient to bring an amendment within the Holman rule, unless on the face of the amendment or in connection with the statement made to the Chair it appeared that the legislation proposed would in fact accomplish the reduction.

I do not know how anyone can tell. A few years ago there was a provision inserted in a bill in the House here authorizing the payment of an Army officer or a naval officer his actual expenses, which were four or five times the amount then authorized by law, and necessarily so.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will allow me the interruption I will make this statement, in support of what he has said: Under the present law an officer receives 7 cents a mile, which includes subsistence at the point to which he is ordered. For example, suppose an officer stationed at Fort Sheridan is ordered down into Missouri to buy mules, and he stays there 7 or 10 days, or 2 weeks, on that service. He gets only the 7 cents a mile between Chicago and the point to which he goes, and has to subsist himself during that 10 days or 2 weeks on the 7 cents a mile. So that, as the gentleman says, the actual expenses would be very much more than the 7 cents a mile. And I may say to the gentleman that this matter has been threshed out, about this mileage of officers, over and over again. Various methods have been sought to be arrived at in order to decrease this item, but it was found that after all the best way to decrease it was to give them the 7 cents a mile, rather than to give them the actual expenses, and it is very evident that a man's actual expenses in traveling can be made to be very much more than if the allowance is a fixed sum; for instance, 7 cents a mile. I really think there is no way of finding out whether or not this will be a reduction.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion in that connection?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. At the time the hearings were held, Gen. Aleshire was asked whether or not the experience of the department in these two methods had not resulted in leading to the inevitable conclusion that the present mileage system was the cheaper and the more economical for the United States Government? I think the chairman of the committee will recall that fact. His statement is the only record on the subject which there is before us.

Mr. HAY. Gen. Aleshire said in the hearings——

Mr. KAHN. At page 66.

Mr. HAY. Gen. Aleshire said—

I believe it would cost the Government more if they undertook to pay the actual traveling expenses, but I believe it would be better for the officers—

That is, that the officer would get more out of it than they do under the present system.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am in sympathy with what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is seeking to accomplish. I have no doubt there have been abuses about this mileage.

In the investigation that I made in connection with the Public Health Service there was bitter complaint many times that it cost officers more than they received, and I have heard the same complaints about the Army. That, however, goes only to the point of order. I do not think the amendment shows that it would effect any reduction in the expenditures to the Government, and personally I do not believe that it would effect any reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that the principle of the Holman rule, as the Chair understands it, was stated a moment ago by the gentleman from Illinois. So the burden is on the gentleman from Indiana to show reasonably and sufficiently that the operation of the legislation would bring about the result.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, if I understand parliamentary law, the burden is always on the person who makes the point of order to show that the point of order is well taken, but I am willing to abide by the suggestion of the Chair. I do not know whether I will be able to do it, but I will undertake it. The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut a moment ago being decisive of this case, I do not think it is parallel at all. I do not believe the Chair will have great difficulty in distinguishing between the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut as applied to the Holman rule, and the amendment offered by myself when the Holman rule is applied to it. If I understood the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut offered a moment ago, under which the Holman rule was sought to be invoked to make his amendment germane to the bill, it was that his amendment on its face showed that it failed to reduce expenditures. When an Army officer is retired, no matter at what age—62 or 64—he is retired at three-quarters pay. Then if the gentleman's amendment had obtained and the officer had been restored to active duty he would naturally have been restored to the pay he was drawing at the time and before he was retired. Therefore it was disclosed upon the face of the amendment that it did not reduce expenditures, but, on the contrary, as the chairman of the Military Committee well argued and as the Chairman finally took the view of it, it increased expenditure.

So I can readily see, unless I am mistaken, a vast difference between the two, and a difference in the line of argument between the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut and mine when the Holman rule is applied to both of them.

Now, then, as the Chair has announced that the burden is on me to show that my amendment does reduce expenditure, I will try and demonstrate it. I take it that the Chair has a perfect right to surround himself with all the physical facts and circumstances connected with this particular item. I remember when I began the practice of law, one of the first principles I ever learned from the law books was that the court judicially knew certain things; that no proof was required one way or the other to substantiate or maintain them. I ask this Chair whether or not it is not fair to invoke the same rule when the Chair comes to pass upon the point of order made against the amendment which I submit? If it be fair, I say to the Chair that almost universally the rule of railroads over this country, of which I know of no exception, especially the trunk lines, transport people for 2 cents a mile. I take it the Chair or any other person can travel from Washington City to San Francisco at a rate of 2 cents a mile, and from Chicago to New Orleans at the same rate.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman understand that in this 7 cents a mile, when they get to the point to which they are ordered that they have to pay their subsistence out of it?

Mr. COX. Yes; I understand that. I repeat, and put it to the Chair, that the Chair has a right to judicially take cognizance of the fact that, as far as the ordinary transportation is concerned, you can travel all over the United States on the trunk lines at 2 cents a mile.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Not just now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take cognizance of that fact.

Mr. COX. To that, Mr. Chairman, must be added the Pullman service. To that must be added the food while traveling on the train. At the ordinary rate of travel, a passenger train will travel per day, I take it, 750 miles. An Army officer traveling that distance would get approximately $50 or a little more. And yet, if the Chairman please, paying his 2-cent fare, $4 for Pullman fare, allowing him $2 or $3 per meal for his three meals a day would amount to less than $25. So he has $25 absolutely to his credit.

Now, the amount allowed in my amendment is 5 cents a mile, and that is the amount that is allowed in most instances to witnesses attending court. That is what the Federal Government allows their witnesses when they subpœna them all over the country to attend courts and trials. They give them 5 cents a mile, and I have never heard it argued for a moment that it was too small.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will remember, during the trial of the Hyde-Benson cases in Washington there was complaint——

Mr. COX. I only yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman does not want to misstate the facts.

Mr. COX. The gentleman can make his statement in his own time. I looked up the question of mileage, and I find it has been changed several times. I do not know that I have all the citations bearing on the question of mileage. In 1873 Congress passed an act giving the Army officers 10 cents a mile while traveling under orders. It was 10 cents a mile from 1873 to 1876, when it was reduced to 8 cents a mile. In 1885 it was put on an actual-expense basis. I am not clear, Mr. Chairman, how many years it remained on the expense basis nor have I looked that question up, but in 1905 it was then put on a 4-cents-a-mile basis, and in 1899 it was increased to 7 cents a mile, where it has remained ever since.

Now, that shows to my mind, Mr. Chairman, one thing conclusively, and that is that these Army officers have had an awful struggle in order to get the tremendous mileage question finally settled. It was evidently found at one time that 10 cents a mile was too much; at another that 8 cents a mile was too much. Whether or not it was found that the actual-expense basis was not satisfactory to the Army officers I do not know, or whether it was further found at one time that the 4-cents-a-mile basis was not sufficient I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the mileage allowance now?

Mr. COX. Seven cents a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that intended to cover?

Mr. COX. It is intended to pay traveling expenses, train fare, Pullman fare, food on the train, and I expect where they stop at hotels in places where they do not have Army quarters, it is also to pay their hotel bills. If I understood the chairman of the committee a moment ago, he said he did not know any plan or any way whereby it could be determined as a question of fact whether or not 7 cents a mile was too much or whether if they be put upon the actual expense basis that would amount to more than 7 cents a mile. I recall this instance, and it is a matter of record since I have been in this Congress. I think I have repeated it before, and at the risk of repetition, I will repeat it again. Up until three or four or possibly five years ago all post-office inspectors were paid $4 per diem. I raised the question in the Post Office Committee. It was strenuously argued there and insisted upon that post-office inspectors could not get along for anything less than $4 per diem. Finally the Postmaster General made this agreement, to make a test case out of it, that he would try the post-office inspectors and put them on the actual expense basis, if I recall correctly, for three months, with a view of seeing whether or not $4 per diem was too much and with a further view of seeing whether or not the per diem could be reduced and whether or not it would be better to put them on the actual expense basis. What was the result? Mr. Chairman, after three months' experience it was found that if the post-office inspectors were reduced from $4 to $3 per day it would save this Government sixty thousand dollars and odd a year, if I recollect correctly, and I do not want to misquote it. It was further found by a matter of calculation, by reducing the per diem from $4 to $3, that that would practically equal the actual expense basis, and it was reduced to $3 per day.

I merely repeat that for the purpose of meeting the argument made by the chairman of the Military Committee, if I remember his statement correctly, when he said that he knew of no way whereby this question could be determined whether or not 7 cents a mile was too much and whether or not, if it be put on the actual basis, it would amount to more than 7 cents a mile. Let a test be made by putting it on the expense basis.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask another question?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. If an officer is ordered from one post to another he has an allowance of 7 cents a mile?

Mr. COX. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands it, that is to cover the railway fare, Pullman fare, and meals on the train?

Mr. COX. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. When he reaches his place of destination he is provided for there in some other way?

Mr. COX. No.

The CHAIRMAN. When he reaches his destination, if he stops in a town or a city where there are no Army quarters, out of this 7 cents a mile he pays his hotel bills?

Mr. COX. I think that is correct.

Mr. HAY. It is only when he is traveling on orders that he gets the 7 cents a mile at all.

Mr. COX. Yes; but he may be traveling from one Army post to another Army post, and while traveling between those two points he gets his 7 cents a mile, and when he reaches his final destination, if it is an Army post, it does not cost him anything to stay there.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the fact that the Chair is trying to develop.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COX. I do not think I am, and I refuse to be interrupted, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. Those are the facts the Chair is trying to develop. What do the records show as to the proportion of traveling between posts and posts?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, in order that the Chairman may be informed, whether the gentleman from Indiana is or not, I will state that there is no allowance of 7 cents a mile paid to an Army officer for traveling from one post to another when he is ordered to change stations. It is only when he is traveling on orders away from his post to some other place, like Chicago or Omaha, where he is sent on duty, that he gets the 7 cents a mile. He does not get 7 cents a mile every time he goes from one Army post to another. He does not get 7 cents a mile when he comes from the Philippine Islands here, when his regiment or command is ordered from the Philippine Islands here.

Mr. COX. But that is covered by another statute entirely. When he is traveling outside of the United States he draws his mileage under another statute, which pays less than 7 cents per mile.

Mr. HAY. He does not get anything personally.

The CHAIRMAN. If he is ordered from Washington to Chicago or to some place where there is not an Army post, and he has to stay there in connection with that assignment for a week or less or more, does he have to pay his own expenses out of that allowance of 7 cents a mile?

Mr. HAY. Yes; out of his own pocket.

Mr. COX. But if he goes to an Army post, then he is not required to pay anything out of the 7 cents a mile.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman want to talk all of the time?

Mr. COX. No; but the chairman has thrown the burden upon me of showing that my amendment reduces or tends to reduce expenditures, and I want to do it if I can.

Mr. HAY. Oh, I think the gentlemen ought, when he makes a statement, if we happen to know that he is mistaken in that statement, to permit us to correct him so that the Chair may be properly informed.

Mr. COX. If I make an erroneous statement, they can correct me in their own time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the exact status. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor. He can not be interrupted by other gentlemen except with his consent. If he yields, very well; if he declines to yield, the gentleman from Indiana is within his rights. Any request, of course, must be directed to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. I will state to the Members that when I reach the point I will readily yield. I do not want to present an erroneous statement at all, but I never could present a matter satisfactorily to myself with several persons picking at me, and the only person I am trying to satisfy now is myself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the committee that investigated this item, a very small amount of evidence was brought out, and I am now going to call attention to the hearings before the committee on this question with a view of meeting the question of whether or not my amendment is within the Holman rule, as far as the evidence developed by the committee sheds any light on the subject. It only covers a little more than one page. No request is made here at all by the chairman of the Military Committee or any member of the committee in order to let us determine this question in some way or other by putting this, at least for a period of time, upon the actual expense basis and trying it out with a view of seeing whether or not 7 cents a mile was too much or too little. And I want to state here, Mr. Chairman, that I am not caring so much about the economy of the proposition, although I do believe that 5 cents a mile would be sufficient, and, if my amendment obtains, it will save one hundred and fifty thousand and odd dollars, and while this is small, yet it is an item worthy of being looked after. But that is not the primary purpose of my amendment, Mr. Chairman, at all. My purpose not only in this amendment, but in all mileage propositions, is to bring the Government as near as we possibly can upon the same basis that all business men treat these propositions. No business concern in all this country would think of paying their employees mileage. The argument that this is not enough does not appeal to me, and should not appeal, in my candid judgment, to anybody else. I mean the amount carried in my amendment, which is 5 cents per mile.

Now, reading from the hearings on page 66:

Mr. LEWIS. Have you any figures that would throw light upon that proposition?

Gen. ALESHIRE. I do not know, sir.

Mr. KAHN. If an officer were sent to some out-of-the-way post, like Sequoia National Park, his transportation by stagecoach would cost him almost 7 cents a mile.

Well, that is an isolated case. Not many Army officers travel to-day, I imagine, by stagecoach. Why was this isolated case selected?

And then the following:

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true, General, that mileage has been made a very considerable source of profit to some officers, somewhat to the scandal of the service on occasion?

Gen. ALESHIRE. I do not know, Mr. SLAYDEN.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Omitting the last part of that question, is it not true that mileage has been made a source of considerable profit on occasion?

Gen. ALESHIRE. I think perhaps there are some officers who draw more mileage than others, but I would rather not express an opinion.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Why do dental surgeons and veterinarians have to travel? Do they not have one at each post ordinarily?

Gen. ALESHIRE. They are mentioned specifically there because their allowances are those of a second lieutenant. All commissioned officers get mileage, and therefore they include dental surgeons and veterinarians. They do not travel very much.

Mr. LEWIS. Suppose an officer takes a trip to Chicago, which is about 900 miles. That would amount to $63 going there and $63 coming back, $126. Let us say he is a day at Chicago. The actual train fare would be about 2½ cents a mile, which would include Pullman fare. His whole expense would be about $55 and his allowance $126.

I have read that, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of showing that there was not much testimony before the committee upon this question. But I repeat what I said a moment ago, that the amendment which I have offered reduces this appropriation $157,000. It is a separate and independent amendment when you undertake to apply the Holman rule to it and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] a moment ago. Again, as I said a moment ago, under the rulings of the Chair heretofore made, if it can be fairly inferred from the fact set out in the amendment that it tends to reduce expenditures, then it comes within the Holman rule. Now, does it reduce expenditures or even tend to secure expenditures? If it does, the point of order is not well taken. Meeting that question or that query, I will put it to the Chair to take under consideration the usual modes of travel in this country. As Mr. LEWIS puts it here, the average rate of travel, paying Pullman fare, would be 2½ cents a mile. The proviso which I intend to make permanent law, if the committee chooses to pass it when taking all the facts and circumstances into consideration, which the Chair will judicially notice, tends to reduce expenditures under this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask, taking off the cost of Pullman fare, railroad fare, the meals on the train, what expenses are to be paid out of the 7 cents a mile?

Mr. COX. Well, I think I have told the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair means in addition to the railway fare and Pullman fare and the cost of meals on the train.

Mr. COX. Nothing, except when they stop at cities where there is no Army post, and at those places they have to pay their expenses.

Now, in that connection, Mr. Chairman, there is but one great department of this Government that has had the nerve to recommend to Congress that its mileage be repealed. The Department of Commerce and Labor in its recommendation has asked Congress to repeal their mileage and put them on an actual expense basis, and on the strength of their recommendation I wrote them a letter as to how much it would save this country, and the reply was that it would save $15,000 a year. The Department of Commerce and Labor, recognizing this evil, in its recommendation this year recommends that their employees be taken off the mileage basis and that they be paid on the actual expense basis. And I understand most of the employees who will be affected there are Army officers, and for this recommendation I desire to heartily commend this great department. So if it will work economy and save $15,000 a year to put the employees of the Department of Commerce and Labor on an actual expense basis, when most of their employees who would be thus affected are officers of the Army, why will it not be economy to put all the officers when traveling under orders on an actual expense basis?

The CHAIRMAN. What was the mileage allowance of the Department of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. COX. I think 7 cents a mile.

Mr. HAY. What has been the result since they have had the actual expense basis?

Mr. COX. They are not on the actual expense basis. The Department of Commerce and Labor recommends that their department be taken off the mileage basis and put on the actual expense basis, and this recommendation was only made this year. When the head of a great department shows a Democratic House how we can economize and save the country $15,000, are we going to turn a deaf ear to it? Is this in line with the economy we have talked so long and loud about?

Mr. HAY. Then it will be very much better for the employees because they will get more money out of it.

Mr. COX. No. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor says they will save $15,000 a year by it, and I imagine the Secretary knows just what he is talking about. The Democratic Party pledged the people economy. Here is a Republican Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor telling us where we can save money and asking us to do it, and we are putting ourselves in the attitude of refusing it.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has indicated that he is desirous of determining this question on the record. The gentleman from Indiana, in sustaining the burden that has been placed upon him, fortifies himself in a very ingenious special plea by quoting from the testimony of Gen. Aleshire, beginning at the foot of page 66 in the hearings had before the Committee on Military Affairs. And if the Chair will take the pains to consult the very line at which the gentleman from Indiana began his reading, the Chair will be impressed with the fact that the gentleman from Indiana began just where Gen. Aleshire left off the important or salient points of his testimony in this regard. The Chair wishes, as I understand, to determine whether or not this provision will result in an actual decrease of the expenses of the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair inquired about.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. There is but one record available, and that, so far as this committee is concerned, is the record of the hearings and the testimony of the Army officer in charge of this particular expenditure, under the examination and the cross-examination of the Committee on Military Affairs; and Gen. Aleshire, the authority on this subject, was asked this specific question:

What sort of mileage allowance is actually made them? Is it the actual cost of transportation?

The CHAIRMAN. On what page is that?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. On page 66. Here is the answer:

Gen. ALESHIRE. No, sir; they get 7 cents a mile.

Mr. LEWIS. A dental surgeon gets 7 cents a mile?

Gen. ALESHIRE. Yes, sir; when he is making certain journeys; and the order provides that the travel is necessary in the public service.

Mr. LEWIS. What is the idea of giving him 7 cents when 2 cents would pay his fare?

In the answer that follows, Gen. Aleshire covers the question put by the Chair. Here is Gen. Aleshire's answer:

Gen. ALESHIRE. Perhaps I can better answer that by referring to the experience of an officer assigned to duty purchasing animals. This officer would be ordered from Chicago, his station, to a point in Missouri or Kentucky, where he would remain for 10 days or two weeks, receiving 7 cents a mile going and returning. All hotel bills and other expenses incident to the journey and absence from his station.

Now mark, Mr. Chairman, how comprehensive that is:

All hotel bills and other expenses incident to the journey and absence from his station, in addition to the cost of transportation, must be paid from the mileage allowance, and if this is not sufficient the deficit must be met from the officer's private funds.

Now, that is the record so far. That answers the question as to what burden is borne by the officers whose allowance is here in question. The examination proceeds:

Mr. KAHN. You also have to pay your Pullman fare out of that allowance?

Gen. ALESHIRE. Everything; and the 7 cents a mile is simply to enable an officer to provide his own transportation and pay his other expenses as far as he can while he is on such a journey. For instance, an officer sent to Chicago from St. Louis received 7 cents a mile and remained at Chicago six months, living at a hotel.

That is all he would be entitled to; an aggregate of 14 cents a mile between the city of Chicago and the city of St. Louis. I read further:

Mr. LEWIS. Of course, a special case could be cited to sustain almost any proposition; but would it not be better to give them actual expenses?

Now, here is the testimony of the expert, the one man of experience, and the only testimony that the Chair has before him:

Gen. ALESHIRE. I believe it would cost the Government more if they undertook to pay the actual traveling expenses and allowances, but I believe it would be better for the officers.

In other words, it would be more remunerative for the officers if the change suggested by the gentleman from Indiana were to be made and more burdensome to the Government.

Now, at that point the gentleman from Indiana began to read, and all that I have read the gentleman from Indiana omitted, and the gentleman from Indiana, furthermore, added the suggestion that there was very little testimony taken on the subject. Of course there was very little testimony taken on the subject if the gentleman's observation, so far as the record is concerned, began at the foot of the page instead of at the head of the page.

Now, if there is any other testimony that any other gentleman on the committee can submit that will refute the testimony of the individual in charge of these disbursements, an officer of long years' experience, then it is in the province of the gentleman from Indiana to submit it, and by refuting it possibly get in a position where he can successfully controvert the argument of the chairman of the committee who has reported this bill, and that of the gentleman from Illinois who makes the point of order. But until he has refuted it with something better than mere hearsay, I think the Chair ought to have very little difficulty in deciding that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana starts out with a false premise. He says you can travel on any of the trunk lines of this country for 2 cents a mile. I have just taken occasion to ring up one of the agents of one of the transcontinental trunk lines of this country, and he tells me that in the ride across the continent there are parts of the line on which the fare is from 3 to 4 cents a mile, especially between stations. There are stretches of railroad in the West where they could not afford to carry passengers for 2 cents a mile, by reason of the fact that they pass station after station where they do not take on any passengers at all. So they charge from 3 to 4 cents a mile.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean to say that they charge from 3 to 4 cents a mile on through tickets on any trunk line?

Mr. KAHN. I say on some portions of the line.

Mr. COX. That is not the question I am propounding to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. That is what I said.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman say it costs 3 or 4 cents a mile from the city of Washington to Seattle?

Mr. KAHN. No; I said on portions of the line. Of course the gentleman knows, if he knows anything about the proposition, that a through ticket is sold for a certain amount.

Mr. COX. For $63 from here to Seattle.

Mr. KAHN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that amount.

Mr. COX. No; I have called up and found out.

Mr. KAHN. I know it is more than that from here to San Francisco, and I believe from here to Seattle is a greater distance than from here to San Francisco; but the total amount is distributed between the various roads that carry the passengers. Here in the East the trunk lines do carry passengers for 2 cents a mile; but when you get west of Chicago, and especially west of the Missouri River, you pay from 3 to 4 cents a mile. Those are the facts. Officers are frequently sent from Chicago to Cheyenne, from Chicago to Denver, from Chicago to Seattle, and on those western roads they can not travel for 2 cents a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. Are any further remarks desired?

Mr. COX. I just want to say a word, in response to the statement of my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE], that I did not read all that Gen. Aleshire said. That is true; but, Mr. Chairman, the absolute physical facts meet Gen. Aleshire and convince this committee, on a moment's consideration, that he did not know what he was talking about. By the physical facts I mean the very things to which I called the attention of the Chair awhile ago as to the cost of travel in this country.

The idea that the Army are in favor of economy in this thing is absurd to me. It is ridiculous. It is laughable. If they were not making money out of it they would be up here at every opportunity they got, insisting upon additional mileage pay.

To repeat, if the Chairman please, I insist seriously that the point of order is not well taken. My amendment shows a reduction of expenditures on its face, and the part which I propose to make permanent law, taken in connection with all the physical facts concerning it, tends to show a reduction of expenditures, so far as this item is concerned, and the point of order should be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. Before ruling the Chair will make a statement of the essential facts. The principle of the ruling having been heretofore announced, it is unnecessary to restate it.

First with relation to the reduction in the total amount, it may be stated that an amendment to this effect does not need the authority of the Holman rule to make it in order. The gentleman from Indiana can offer an amendment affecting a reduction in any aggregate total without reference to this rule.

Now in respect to the legislative portion of the amendment, the Chair will say that if the allowance of 7 cents a mile was merely intended to cover the cost of railroad transportation, the Pullman cost, tips, and meals on the train, the Chair would not have the slightest hesitation in reaching the conclusion that a provision for actual expenses would necessarily reduce expenses, having reference to facts of the cost of railway travel that are matters of common knowledge.

But another feature is presented. It appears that this allowance of 7 cents a mile is intended to cover other expenses than the cost of travel on the railways, tips, Pullman fares, and the cost of meals. When the party entitled to this allowance reaches his destination, his expenses for an indefinite period are paid out of this same fund. Sometimes the allowance might be more than sufficient to pay the costs of travel, and the further costs accruing at the point of destination. At other times this allowance might be insufficient. Having reference to the entire body of expenses it is a matter of speculation, whether an allowance of 7 cents a mile, or the payment of actual expenses would be the cheaper policy for the Government. But looking in the hearings to the testimony of one man who ought to have some practical, I might almost say expert knowledge on the subject, (I refer to the testimony of Gen. Aleshire), I find that he states that in his judgment, under the policy of paying actual expenses, as compared with an allowance of 7 cents a mile, the Government would be the loser, and the officers the gainers.

Having in mind all the facts, including the statement of this witness how can the Chair conclude that this amendment will reasonably and sufficiently operate to reduce expenses? And yet to hold that this amendment is in order the Chair must be reasonably satisfied that the legislative portion of the amendment operating of its own force will effect a reduction of expenditures. This is the whole question as the Chair sees it, and so far as the Chair is apprised this amendment will not necessarily effect a retrenchment.

There seems to be such a succession of rulings necessary to be made under the Holman rule, that the Chair would be very glad to have an appeal taken from some one ruling, and the question of principle involved, affirmatively settled by the committee. The Chair has no pride of opinion. He merely desires to see the controlling principle of interpretation correctly and authoritatively announced. On an appeal, the committee could determine whether this amendment will operate with reasonable certainty to reduce expenditures. Unless it will so operate, it is not in order. The Chair sustains the point of order to the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported a bill (H. R. 28180) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report (No. 1341), ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I desire to give notice that I wish to call up this bill for consideration immediately after the conclusion of the Army appropriation bill.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the conference report on the immigration bill, S. 3175, an act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed, under the rule.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to now reserve points of order against the conference report?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can reserve them now or make them some other time.

Mr. SABATH. I do not desire to be deprived of my rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make his points of order before the statement is read.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I will call this report up immediately after the reading of the Journal in the morning.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ILLINOIS RIVER NEAR HAVANA, ILL.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table a similar bill, being on the House Calendar, the bill (S. 7637) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Illinois River near Havana.

The SPEAKER laid the bill before the House, which the Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railroad Co., a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Illinois, and its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Illinois River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Havana, in the State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar House bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 26339. An act for the relief of Joseph W. McCall.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATIONS ORDERED BY THE SENATE.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report the following Senate joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole. (H. Rept. 1342.)

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution 150.

Joint resolution appropriating $40,000 for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sum:

"For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, to be immediately available, $40,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25518) for constructing a fish ladder over Derby Dam, Truckee River, Nev., and the same was referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 17, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communciations were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a statement of expenditures in the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1271); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of John A. Kress v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1272); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Lorenzo W. Cooke v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1273); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Daniel C. Pearson v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1274); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Abner H. Merrill v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1275); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Quincy O'M. Gillmore v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1276); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court filed in the case of Charles E. L. B. Davis v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1277); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court filed in the case of Edward Davis v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1278); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, submitted a report (No. 1336) in the matter of the investigation of the White Earth Reservation, situated in the State of Minnesota, with transcript of testimony taken and exhibits offered from July 25, 1911, to March 28, 1912, which report was referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HENSLEY, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, submitted a report (No. 1335) in the matter of the investigation of charges that the Interior Department permitted the unlawful fencing and inclosure of certain lands of the public domain in the States of Colorado and Wyoming, and more particularly the fencing and inclosure of 46,330 acres of public lands in Wyoming and 1,120 acres in Colorado by the Warren Live Stock Co., which said report was referred to the House Calendar, together with the minority views.

Mr. BRANTLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 767) requesting from the President of the United States information concerning the exemption of American importers of manila hemp from payment of the export tax thereon, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1338), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 27875) authorizing the President to convey certain land to the State of Texas, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1337), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRANTLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 27323) to provide for refund or abatement under certain conditions of penalty taxes imposed by section 38 of the act of August 5, 1909, known as the special excise corporation-tax law, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1339), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. LEVY, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28056) for the relief of Albert W. Phelps, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1304), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28043) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Robert B. Pearce, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1305), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28075) for the relief of the Pennsylvania Engineering Co., of the city of Philadelphia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1306), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28040) providing for the refund of certain duties incorrectly collected on wild-celery seed, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1307), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CANTRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28063) for the relief of Thomas Haycock, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1308), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28080) for the relief of W. W. Blood, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1309), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FRANCIS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28060) for the relief of Preston B. C. Lucas, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1310), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28072) for the relief of H. A. Shirkey, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1311), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FRANCIS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28050) for the relief of Wickliff Fry, for horse lost while hired by the United States Geological Survey, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1312), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DICKINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28084) for the relief of Thomas R. Mason, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1313), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 391) to reimburse William Van Derveer, of Millboro, Va., for excess revenue taxes assessed against and collected from him, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1314), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4166) for the relief of Lawson Reno, collector second district of Kentucky, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1315), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19445) for the relief of Edward William Bailey, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1316), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28077) for the relief of the estate of William D. Allen, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1317), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28034) for the relief of James Stanton, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1318), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28092) for the relief of Mrs. L. A. Royster, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1319), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28057) for the relief of Amanda Honert, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1320), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28047) for the relief of John Streckfus, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1321), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FOWLER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28058) for the relief of James A. Showen, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1322), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28044) for the relief of W. W. Wall, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1323), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DICKINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28059) to reimburse Gaston R. THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. WORKS. I have here a memorial of the National Business League of America in support of Senate joint resolution 78, together with some short newspaper editorials bearing upon the same subject. Some of these editorials go back as far as 1904, at which time this same business league was supporting the principle involved in the joint resolution. I ask that the memorial and the editorials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BEGINNING OF THE MOVEMENT FOR A SINGLE SIX-YEAR TERM FOR THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

At a meeting of the executive committee of the National Business League, held in Chicago, January 14, 1904, a movement was inaugurated, by unanimous adoption of the following preamble and resolutions, to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to provide for a six-year presidential term, making the Chief Executive ineligible for reelection:

Whereas in view of the vast, diversified, and rapidly increasing industries and commerce of the United States and the multitude of people relying on the successful operation of productive and trade enterprises, which, to be continuously and evenly prosperous, should be unhampered by frequent distracting influences of the public mind; and

Whereas the President of the United States of America is, as provided in section 1, Article II, of the Constitution of the United States, elected to office for the brief term of four years, and thereafter is eligible for reelection as President for a like term or terms; and

Whereas a presidential campaign, aside from its frequent recurrence, and by reason of its expensive methods, inevitable political excitement over candidates, new issues and the possibility of a change of policy by new administrations, especially as to the tariff and finances, involves the commercial interests of the country in a condition of unrest and uncertainty, producing a partial paralysis of business activities and delaying promotion of new undertakings for at least one year before and possibly for some time subsequent to, the election of a Chief Executive: Therefore be it

Resolved, That, as a measure of the greatest import to the manufacturing and commercial interests, wage earners, and the people generally, by reason of a consequent longer period of industrial tranquility and prosperity, also as a means of relieving the President of many annoyances that seriously interfere with the unrestricted discharge of his official duties to the people, the National Business League hereby recommends an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the presidential term at six years and making the Chief Executive ineligible for reelection; and be it also

Resolved, That the National Business League hereby adopts the proposition as an important subject of its efforts for the common good, on which its best endeavors shall be directed until the aforesaid proposed amendment is duly ratified by the States and confirmed by the Congress of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, to all manufacturers, commercial organizations, prominent business firms, and the press throughout the country.

[Editorial from the Chicago Evening Post, Aug. 17, 1904.]

SIX-YEAR PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Elsewhere in this issue the Evening Post presents the views of prominent business and professional men of the country regarding the movement set afoot by the National Business League to secure an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which would lengthen the presidential term to six years and make the Chief Executive ineligible for reelection. The reasons advanced for the change are eminently sound and the Evening Post heartily indorses the proposition.

As the league points out in the letter which invited the responses printed, presidential campaigns now are too frequent, enormously expensive to business interests, and sure creators of turmoil and uncertainly "to the great disadvantage of capital and labor." They "indefinitely prevent the beginning and check the growth of industrial enterprises," and presidential years show a decidedly bad effect on commercial transactions generally.

Such arguments as the foregoing must appeal with peculiar force to business interests everywhere; but the fourth reason given by the league should have the thoughtful consideration of every citizen: "The President during his first term naturally being anxious to succeed himself is kept busy considering the demands of politicians and planning for a second term; meanwhile important legislation for the general good waits."

Commenting on this Judge Tuley says that such a constitutional amendment "will mean the overthrow of the 'boss' and 'machine' government of the people now existing." Deprived of patronage the "boss" and the "machine" must cease to exist. Then, in the words of Judge Tuley, "the people will again govern themselves."

Of the hundreds of replies received by the league not more than 1 per cent are unfavorable or indifferent to the movement. It is a plan certain to be indorsed by every business interest in the country. Add to this the desirableness of a return to genuine self-government through freeing the President from the dictation of the political "boss" and the political "machine" and we easily may foresee hearty popular commendation of the initiative taken by the National Business League.

The practical politician may oppose the movement because he is the only one to be hurt by its success. But let it once be clearly understood that the people and the business interests desire the amendment; that the welfare of the Nation demands it, and there will be few States in the Union that will hesitate to give to Congress the necessary authority to act finally once the question is submitted to them.

[Editorial from Chicago Evening Post, Oct. 24, 1904.]

THE SIX-YEAR TERM.

To-day the Evening Post prints a second installment of letters that have come to the National Business League of Chicago in response to its proposal regarding a six-year single-tenure term for the President of the United States. These letters show that the efforts of the league are systematic and well organized; but they show, with equal force, that the business interests of the country are taking up this matter with an earnestness that promises ultimate success.

As clearly brought out in this and the previous article in the Evening Post, there are many strong argumcnts in favor of the proposition and very few against it. Here and there a politician objects to lengthening the presidential term, and especially to making an incumbent of the high office ineligible for reelection, but the reasons given are among the most convincing arguments offered in support of the change—they show so plainly the manifest evils of the present system.

The National Business League is not unmindful of the difficulties that lie in the way of securing any amendment to the National Constitution, but it realizes the vast power and influence that must be wielded by the united business interests of this preeminently commercial Nation. It does not follow that because the only amendments made to the Constitution since its adoption were a result of war that nothing but war can secure an amendment. Great changes have taken place in this country and in the world since the latest additions were made to the fundamental law of the United States, not the least of which is the growing general recognition that the advances due to peaceful agitation are more likely to be safe and permanent than those forced by the sword.

What our business interests demand they sooner or later succeed in getting. The National Business League is securing the cordial cooperation of other business organizations and of influential men throughout the country. It has announced its determination not to relax its efforts until a satisfactory conclusion is reached. In this fact rests the greatest promise of success. The presidential election seriously disturbs business; the eligibility of the President to reelection has a baneful effect on our political life. Thurman said: "You will never have any genuine reform in the civil service until you adopt the one-term principle in reference to the Presidency."

Business wishes to have these periods of disturbance farther apart; the increasing number of independent citizens desires a genuine civil-service reform, cleaner politics, fewer opportunities for corruption in public life. These forces are certain to unite in support of the constitutional amendment advocated by the National Business League, and, once united, the object of their concerted effort is certain of attainment.

It is a very difficult but not an impossible thing to amend the Constitution of the United States, and in this age of unparalleled commercial and industrial activity we can fancy no more likely amendment than one intended primarily to protect and conserve our business interests.

[Editorial from the Chicago Daily News.]

In urging the adoption of a constitutional amendment extending the presidential term to six years, and forbidding the reelection of a Chief Magistrate of the Nation, the executive committee of the National Business League has thrown its influence on the side of an important reform.

The business men of the country realize keenly that with the presidential year they are entering upon a period of political turmoil which in the existing circumstances is worse than useless. There are no great issues pressing for settlement. The country is prosperous and contented. Yet the approach of the national campaign has set the demagogues at work hunting issues and manufacturing party cries merely to get the voters stirred up and to render the public uneasy and apprehensive. The psychological effect of all this must be to spread the blight of uncertainty and vague alarm in business affairs, to the grievous hurt of the people generally. Why not lengthen the presidential term and thus reduce the number of these costly disturbances?

Students of political conditions are well aware that the first term of every President is largely influenced by the desire of himself and his supporters in and out of office to prepare the way for his reelection. Thus it comes about that the inducements to run the administration so as to gratify the President's personal ambition are almost irresistible. The interests of millions of people are continually subordinated to his longing for a second term.

To give the President a term of six years, with no possibility of obtaining a second under any circumstances, would be to bestow upon the country a larger measure of tranquillity and a government genuinely planned to promote the general welfare.

[From the Chicago Record-Herald.]

No doubt the argument that will appeal most strongly to the business interests of the country, in fact to all men who love the peaceful pursuit of productive industry, is found in the fact that a six-year term would make the intervals between presidential campaigns longer and the disturbance of business conditions less frequent. The average business man does not believe that his aversion to political excitement and upheaval is incompatible with patriotism. He is willing to have the country "set on fire" by the spellbinders and business suspended for a few months in order to elect a President, provided it doesn't come too often. Once every six years would suit him perfectly.

But to most men who are familiar with politics and politicians the strongest feature of the proposed amendment is the one-term idea. If the President were ineligible for reelection, he would be absolutely free and untrammeled in the administration of his high office. He need not be hampered by the hungry horde of place hunters that generally dogs the steps of the President for months after his election. The business of "laying wires" to hold State delegations for a future nominating convention would be a thing of the past. The most high-minded, patriotic President is not free from an ambition to succeed himself. It is too much to expect him to offend the leaders who control the sources of party power, even though a high sense of public duty may seem at times to demand it.

The six-year-one-term idea for President will grow in popular favor the more its very obvious benefits are studied and understood.

[Editorial from the Chicago Daily Journal, June 18, 1904.]

CHANGING THE PRESIDENTIAL TENURE.

The proposition to extend the presidential term to six years and to render the occupant ineligible for reelection will find favor in the business world.

Many good reasons for the change are set forth by the National Business League, which has taken the matter up with a vigor and persistence worthy of success.

It is claimed that presidential campaigns are too frequent, too expensive, and too disturbing in their effects upon business.

It is shown by the league that presidential years are marked by an increase of business failures and by a decrease of exports, bank clearings, stock sales, and commercial transactions generally.

Certainly these are strong reasons why national campaigns should not so frequently disturb the country.

But they will not appeal so readily to public sentiment as the second proposition—limiting the President to a single term.

The most serious menace to our republican form of government is the liberty afforded an ambitious Chief Executive, with unlimited patronage at his disposal, to build up a machine and continue himself in office.

While such power exists the people, no matter how ardently they may desire a change, are practically helpless.

Fortunately few of our Presidents have been disposed to exercise this unbridled advantage. The time may come, however, when its employment by an unscrupulous occupant of the White House will reveal to the people their political impotency.

Not the business interests of the country alone but the whole people are interested in the preservation of whatever rights the electorate may have in the choice of a Chief Magistrate.

IN RE A SINGLE SIX-YEAR TERM FOR THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Whereas on May 21, 1912, the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate reported favorably the Senate joint resolution No. 78, introduced by Mr. WORKS of California, the text being as follows:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years; and no person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.

"The President, together with a Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows."

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the National Business League of America hereby indorses the said Senate joint resolution No. 78, as favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Chicago, January 14, 1913.

GEO. W. SHELDON,
President.

ARMY AND NAVY UNION.

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 239) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver a condemned cannon to the Army and Navy Union, United States of America, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1122) thereon.

MOUNT OLIVET CEMETERY LANDS, SALT LAKE COUNTY, UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 8092) granting to the Emigration Canon Railroad Co., a corporation of the State of Utah, permission, in so far as the United States is concerned, to occupy for a right of way for its railroad track a certain piece of land now included in the Mount Olivet Cemetery, Salt Lake County, Utah, and I submit a report (No. 1120) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. From what committee does it come?

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a unanimous report, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Emigration Canon Railroad Co., a corporation of the State of Utah, is hereby granted permission, in so far as the United States is concerned, to occupy, for a right of way for its railroad track, that piece of land now included in the Mount Olivet Cemetery, Salt Lake County, Utah, particularly bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point 169 feet east and 100 feet north of the southwest corner of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in Salt Lake County, Utah; thence northwesterly rounding a twenty-degree curve, a distance of 351.99 feet, to a point on the west line of the said military reservation, a distance of 387.9 feet north from the southwest corner of said reservation; thence south to a point 100 feet north of the southwest corner of said Fort Douglas Military Reservation; thence east a distance of 169 feet to place of beginning; containing in all 0.319 acre.

Mr. BRISTOW. My attention was diverted. What is the bill, and what is the request?

Mr. SMOOT. By an act of Congress approved January 23, 1909, a portion of this reservation, amounting to about 50 acres, was conveyed by deed to the Mount Olivet Cemetery Association, Salt Lake, for the burial of the dead, with the reservation that it should be used for that purpose, and when not so used it should revert to the Government of the United States.

The Emigration Railroad has a track upon one side of it, and has had for years. At the end of it there is a 5½ per cent grade with a seventy-degree curve, and it is quite dangerous. The Mount Olivet Cemetery people are perfectly willing that the railroad company should take about one-third of an acre of the corner of the land so as to make a curve instead of a sharp turn.

There is no objection on the part of the department and no objection on the part of the cemetery people. It is simply obviating a very dangerous situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BAY CITY, TEX.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 7639) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Bay City, in the State of Texas, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes to be erected upon the site already acquired in the city of Bay City, Tex., a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office in the city of Bay City, Tex., the cost of the building, including vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches complete not to exceed $75,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CROW INDIANS OF MONTANA.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I reported yesterday a resolution from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it was discussed at some length. I desire now to renew the request for unanimous consent to consider that resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 352, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to furnish information to the Attorney General and the Attorney General to make an investigation and bring action in reference to the affairs of the Crow Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Indian Affairs report to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized to investigate the affairs of the Crow Indians of Montana and to bring and prosecute such action as may be necessary to protect the interests and secure the rights of such Indians, or of any member of them, and all departments of the Government are authorized to turn over to the Attorney General such records, papers, and other information as he may require to make such investigation or bring such action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JACOB M. COOPER.

Mr. SANDERS. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 3859) for the relief of Jacob M. Cooper, and I submit a report (No. 1121) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Jacob M. Cooper, now a resident of Iowa, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company C, Twenty-second Regiment United States Infantry, July 18, 1868. But no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for grading and macadamizing Longfellow Street in the District of Columbia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of Indians on the Flathead Reservation in Montana, etc., from $150,000 to $400,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,573.25 to pay Omer D. Lewis, lease clerk at the Flathead Indian Agency, Mont., for expenses incurred for hospital and doctors' fees for personal injuries received while aiding Federal officers in suppressing the sale of liquor to Indians, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 to repair the Government bridge across the Niobrara River in Knox County, Nebr., for the use of the Santee and Ponca Indians, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 27475) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

FOREST RESERVES IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 434), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate at as early a date as possible the names of the forest reserves in the State of Washington; the area of each; the number of homestead entries allowed in each under the act of June 11, 1906; the number of ranger stations in each and the area reserved for ranger purposes; the number of acres under cultivation in connection with ranger stations; the number of applications that are now pending under said act of June 11, 1906; the number rejected and the number allowed in each of said reserves.

FRIEDMANN CURE FOR TUBERCULOSIS (S. DOC. NO. 1018).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a memorandum of the Secretary of State, inclosing a report prepared by the consul general at Berlin, in regard to the Friedmann cure for tuberculosis.

The report is sent in reply to a resolution of the Senate of January 2, 1913, by which I am requested to submit to the Senate the results of any investigation of the Friedmann cure made or being made by the American consul general in Germany or any other officer of the United States.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1913.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Immigration:

H. R. 19544. An act to amend section 9 of the immigration act approved February 20, 1907; and

H. R. 20195. An act to amend the naturalization laws.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCES.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5861) to enjoin and abate houses of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution; to declare the same to be nuisances; to enjoin the person or persons who conduct or maintain the same and the owner or agent of any building used for such purpose; and to assess a tax against the person maintaining said nuisance and against the building and owner thereof. The bill was read in full on the 13th.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is that a bill which is going to provoke discussion?

Mr. CURTIS. I think not. I will not press it if it does.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will not object if it leads to no discussion.

Mr. CURTIS. I will withdraw it, if there is any trouble.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 4, after the word "own," to insert "occupy," so as to read:

That whoever shall erect, establish, continue, maintain, use, own, occupy, or re-lease any building, erection, or place used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution in the District of Columbia is guilty of a nuisance, and the building, erection, or place, or the ground itself in or upon which such lewdness, assignation, or prostitution is conducted, permitted, or carried on, continued, or exists, and the furniture, fixtures, musical instruments, and contents are also declared a nuisance, and shall be enjoined and abated as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 5, line 6, after the word "section," to strike out the following:

For removing and selling the movable property the officer shall be entitled to charge and receive the same fees as he would for levying upon and selling like property on execution, and for closing the premises and keeping them closed a reasonable sum shall be allowed by the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 6, line 22, after the word "to," to insert "the," and on page 7, line 6, after the word "act," to strike out "excepting that 10 per cent of the amount collected shall be paid by the collector of taxes to the attorney representing the United States for the District of Columbia in the injunction action at the time of final judgment," so as to read:

In case the assessor fails or neglects to make said assessment the same shall be made by the chief of police, and a return of said assessment shall be made to the collector of taxes. Said tax shall be a perpetual lien upon all property, both personal and real, used for the purpose of maintaining said nuisance, and the payment of said tax shall not relieve the person or building from any other penalties provided by law. The provisions of the law relating to the collection and distribution of taxes upon personal and real property shall govern in the collection and distribution of the tax herein prescribed in so far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, to strike out section 9, in the following words:

SEC. 9. That this act shall take effect and be in force 90 days after its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 9. The United States district attorney or other attorney representing the prosecution for violation of this statute, with the approval of the court, may grant immunity to any witness called to testify in behalf of the prosecution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 19115, known as the omnibus claims bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, there are two or three amendments from the Committee on Claims in relation to longevity or overtime navy-yard charges, exactly similar to those which have already been incorporated in the bill. I will send them to the desk and ask to have them adopted:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments proposed by the Senator will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 153, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

To Joseph M. Padgett, $451.09.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed, on page 157, after line 14, to insert the following:

To Hannah McCray, widow of John McCray, deceased, $362.67.
To James H. Macon, sr., $126.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the findings in these cases printed in the RECORD?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I also submit an amendment covering several cases, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 203, after line 18, it is proposed to insert:

To Eleanor L. and Henry C. Lovell, sole heirs of Henry C. Lovell, deceased, $906.66.
To Annie I. Fernald Crowell, widow (remarried) of Alonzo Fernald, deceased, $586.40.
To Margaret A. Norton, widow of Daniel C. Norton, deceased, $596.86.
To Emma S. Wherren, administratrix of James W. Wherren, deceased, $140.43.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to, and the findings will be printed in the RECORD.

The findings referred to are as follows:

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 3, 1912.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

[Court of Claims. Congressional, No. 13727. Subnumbers 237 and 239. 237, Hannah McCray, widow of John McCray, deceased; 239, James H. Macon, sr., v. The United States. Pensacola Navy Yard.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for the payment of the above-named claimants for services rendered at the Pensacola Navy Yard between March 21, 1878, and September 22, 1882, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours.

On the 22d day of May, 1908, the United States Senate referred to the court a bill in the following words:

"[S. 6702, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

"A bill for the relief of John W. Knight and others.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John W. Knight, and to the others who have joined with him in a petition to this Congress, dated April 6, 1908, the amounts that may be found due to each of them, respectively, for extra labor, above the legal day of 8 hours, while employed by the United States as workmen, laborers, or mechanics of the various navy yards of the United States, performed by them by reason of and under the provisions of Circular No. 8, issued by the Secretary of the Navy on March 21, 1878."

Thereafter the claimants named above, and each of them, offered and filed their respective petitions herein, in which they, and each of them, aver substantially as follows:

That between March 21, 1878, and the 21st day of September, 1882, they, and each of them, were employed by the Government of the United States at the navy yard at Pensacola, Fla.; that on the 21st day of March, 1878, the Secretary of the Navy issued the order referred to in claimant's petition, known as "Circular No. 8" and set forth in Finding I herein.

That during the six months in each year from the date of said order to the 21st day of September, 1882, they worked during all or a portion of the time they were so employed in excess of eight hours per day, and that they, and each of them, were paid for only eight hours' work per day for the time that they were so employed during said period, and that they, and each of them, are entitled to the amounts set forth in their respective petitions, being the pay for all time worked during said period in excess of eight hours per day.

The case was brought to a hearing on the evidence and merits on the 8th day of January, 1912.

Messrs. Clarence W. De Knight and Brandenburg & Brandenburg appeared for the claimants, and the Attorney General, by Percy M. Cox, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. Between the 21st day of March, 1878, and the 22d day of September, 1882, the claimants herein, or their decedents, and each of them, were in the employ of the United States in the navy yard at Pensacola, Fla., during which time the following order was in force:

Circular No. 8.] NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1878.

The following is hereby substituted, to take effect from this date, for the circular of October 25, 1877, in relation to the working hours at the several navy yards and shore stations:

The working hours will be, from March 21 to September 21, from 7 a. m. to 6 p. m.; from September 22 to March 20, from 7.40 a. m. to 4.30 p. m., with the usual intermission of one hour for dinner.

The department will contract for the labor of mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers on the basis of eight hours a day. All workmen electing to labor ten hours a day will receive a proportionate increase of their wages.

The commandant will notify the men employed or to be employed of these conditions, and they are at liberty to continue or accept employment under them or not.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

II. Said claimants, and each of them, or their decedents, while in the employ of the United States as aforesaid, worked on the average the number of hours set opposite their respective names in excess of 8 hours a day at the wages stated, to wit: 237, John McCray, 1,450½ hours, at $2 per day; 239, James H. Macon, sr., 166½ hours, at $1.50 per day; 33 hours, at $1 per day; 419⅝ hours, at $1.74 per day.

III. If it is considered that 8 hours constituted a day's work during the period from March 21, 1878, to September 22, 1882, under said Circular No. 8, then the claimants, or their decedents, have been underpaid the sums set opposite their respective names, as follows:

Hannah McCray, widow of John McCray, deceased, $362.67.
James H. Macon, sr., $126.50.

IV. Said claims were never presented to any department or officer of the Government prior to their presentation to Congress and reference to the court as hereinbefore set forth in the statement of the case, and no competent evidence is adduced to show why claimants did not earlier prosecute their said claims.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claims herein are not legal ones against the United States, and are equitable only in the sense that the United States received the benefit of the services of claimants, or their decedents, in excess of 8 hours a day, as above set forth.

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 14, 1912.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

[In the Court of Claims of the United States. Congressional, No. 15476—23, 27, 32. No. 23, Annie I. Fernald Crowell, widow (remarried) of Alonzo Fernald, deceased; No. 27, Margaret A. Norton, widow of Daniel C. Norton, deceased; No. 32, Emma S. Wherren, administratrix of James W. Wherren, deceased, v. The United States.]

The claims herein are for services rendered by claimants at the Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy Yard between March 21, 1878, and September 22, 1882, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours.

On the 19th day of February, 1908, the United States Senate by resolution referred to the court Senate bill No. 5528, which is in the following words:

"A bill for the relief of Joseph M. Padgett and others.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Joseph M. Padgett, and to the others who have joined with him in a petition to this Congress, dated February 17, 1908, the amounts that may be found due to each of them, respectively, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours, while employed by the United States as workmen, laborers, or mechanics at the various navy yards of the United States, performed by them by reason and under the provisions of Circular No. 8, issued by the Secretary of the Navy on March 21, 1878."

Thereafter, the claimants above named appeared and filed their petitions in this court, in which they aver substantially as follows:

That between March 21, 1878, and September 21, 1882, they were employed by the Government of the United States at the navy yard at Portsmouth, N. H.; that on March 21, 1878, the Secretary of the Navy issued the order referred to in claimants' petitions, known as "Circular 8," and hereinafter set forth in Finding I.

That during the six months in each year from the date of said order to the 21st day of September, 1882, they worked during all or a portion of the time they were so employed during said period, and that they are entitled to the value of the time worked in excess of eight hours a day.

The cases were brought to a hearing on the evidence and merits on the 28th day of May, 1912.

Messrs. Brandenburg & Brandenburg and Clarence W. De Knight appeared for the claimants, and the Attorney General, by Percy M. Cox, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. Between the 21st day of March, 1878, and the 22d day of September, 1882, the decedents herein were in the employ of the United States in the navy yard at Portsmouth, N. H., during which time the following order was in force:

Circular No. 8.] NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1878.

The following is hereby substituted, to take effect from this date, for the circular of October 25, 1877, in relation to the working hours at the several navy yards and shore stations:

The working hours will be, from March 21 to September 21, from 7 a. m. to 6 p. m., from September 22 to March 20, from 7.40 a. m. to 4.30 p. m., with the usual intermission of one hour for dinner.

The department will contract for the labor of mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers on the basis of eight hours a day. All workmen electing to labor ten hours a day will receive a proportionate increase in their wages.

The commandants will notify the men employed or to be employed of these conditions, and they are at liberty to continue or accept employment under them or not.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

II. Said decedents and each of them, while in the employ of the United States as aforesaid, worked on the average the number of hours set opposite their respective names in excess of eight hours a day and at the wages below stated, to wit:

	Hours.
No. 23. Alonzo Fernald, at $3 per day	1,030½
No. 27. Daniel C. Norton:
At $3 per day	1,438
At $2.74 per day	10
At $3.26 per day	133
No. 32. James W. Wherren, at $3 per day	374½

III. If it is considered that eight hours constituted a day's work during the period from March 21, 1878, to September 22, 1882, under said Circular No. 8, then claimants' decedents have been underpaid the sums set opposite their respective names, as follows:

No. 23. Annie I. Fernald Crowell, widow (remarried) of Alonzo Fernald, deceased, $386.40.

No. 27. Margaret A. Norton, widow of Daniel C. Norton, deceased, $596.86.

No. 32. Emma S. Wherren, administratrix of James W. Wherren, deceased, $140.43.

IV. The claim of Alonzo Fernald was filed in this court in 1888 under No. 16321, general jurisdiction, and same was dismissed in 1906 for want of prosecution, and no reason is given why the claim was not prosecuted to a final judgment in this court.

Except as above stated, the claims herein were never presented to any department or officer of the Government prior to the presentation thereof to Congress and reference to this court as set forth in the statement of the case, and no evidence is adduced to show why said claimants did not earlier prosecute their claims.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claims herein are not legal ones against the United States and are equitable only in the sense that the United States received the benefit of the services of said decedents in excess of eight hours a day as above set forth.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusions filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours,
JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

[In the Court of Claims of the United States. Congressional, No. 14188-70. Eleanor L. and Henry C. Lovell, sole heirs of Henry C. Lovell, v. The United States. Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy Yard.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for payment of the above-named claimants for services rendered at the Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy Yard, between March 21, 1878, and September 22, 1882, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours.

On the 22d day of May, 1908, the United States Senate referred to the court a bill in the following words:

"[S. 6702, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

"A bill for the relief of John W. Knight and others.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to John W. Knight and to the others who have joined with him in a petition to this Congress, dated April 6, 1908, the amounts that may be found due to each of them, respectively, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours while employed by the United States as workmen, laborers, or mechanics of the various navy yards of the United States, performed by them by reason of and under the provisions of Circular No. 8, issued by the Secretary on March 21, 1878."

Thereafter the claimants above named, and each of them, offered and filed their respective petitions herein in which they, and each of them, aver substantially as follows:

That between March 21, 1878, and the 21st day of September, 1882, they and each of them were employed by the Government of the United States at the navy yard at Portsmouth, N. H.; that on the 21st day of March, 1878, the Secretary of the Navy issued the order referred to in claimant's petition, known as "Circular No. 8," and set forth in Finding I herein.

That during the six months in each year from the date of said order to the 21st day of September, 1882, they worked during all of a portion of the time they were so employed in excess of eight hours per day, and that they, and each of them, were paid only for eight hours' work per day for the time that they were so employed during said period, and that they, and each of them, are entitled to the amounts set forth in their respective petitions, being the pay for all time worked during said period in excess of eight hours per day.

The case was brought to a hearing on the evidence and merits on the 29th day of May, 1912.

Messrs. Clarence W. De Knight and Brandenburg & Brandenburg appeared for the claimants, and the Attorney General, by Percy M. Cox, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. Between the 21st day of March, 1878, and the 22d day of September, 1882, the claimants herein, or their decedents, and each of them, were in the employ of the United States in the navy yard at Portsmouth, N. H., during which time the following order was in force:

Circular No. 8.] NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1878.

The following is hereby substituted, to take effect from this date, for the circular of October 25, 1877, in relation to the working hours at the several navy yards and shore stations:

The working hours will be, from March 21 to September 21, from 7 a. m. to 6 p. m.; from September 22 to March 20, from 7.40 a. m. to 4.30 p. m., with the usual intermission of one hour for dinner.

The department will contract for the labor of mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers on the basis of eight hours a day. All workmen electing to labor ten hours a day will receive a proportionate increase of their wages.

The commandant will notify the men employed, or to be employed, of these conditions, and they are at liberty to continue or accept employment under them or not.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

II. Said decedent while in the employ of the United States as aforesaid worked on the average 1,450⅝ hours in excess of eight hours a day, at the rate of $5 per day.

III. If it is considered that eight hours constituted a day's work during the period from March 21, 1878, to September 22, 1882, under said Circular No. 8, then said decedent has been underpaid the sum of $906.66.

IV. The claim herein was filed in this court in 1888 under No. 16321, general jurisdiction, and was dismissed in 196, for want of prosecution, and no reason is given why said claim was not prosecuted to final judgment in this court.
